LINGUISTIC TYPOLOGY

Editor-in-Chief: Frans Plank, Universität Konstanz, Germany

LINGUISTIC TYPOLOGY publishes original research on the diversity of languages and on the patterns of variation within this universe. The essence of typology lies in structural traits – ranging from sound and grammar to lexicon and discourse – that could vary independently from language to language but actually do vary together, setting limits to cross-linguistic variation and defining the groundplans on which languages are constructed. The discovery and the explanation of such interdependencies and the informed discussion of results and methods in typology are the subject matter of this journal.
