

Acknowledgments

I completed much of the research for this book as a Charles Bullard Fellow at Harvard Forest. I am grateful to the researchers and staff at that very welcoming institution, who were so helpful and a great pleasure to work with. Special thanks to Dave Orwig, Emery Boose, Audrey Barker Plotkin, Elaine Doughty, Julie Pallant, John O’Keefe, Clarisse Hart, Scot Wiinikka, Edythe Ellin, and Laurie Chiasson. Brian Hall stepped up with his considerable mapping skills and created the illustrations that help explain the meteorology. David Foster, Harvard Forest’s director, deserves superlatives in many regards: inspiring teacher and leader, prolific writer, and highly influential figure in the world of ecology and conservation, he still always found time to help me understand the nuances of natural and human disturbance. He has opened many doors for me, and for that, I am indeed grateful.

I thank Bob Saul, whose encouragement, enthusiasm for this project, and generosity made it possible for me to set aside the time I needed to complete the writing.

Acknowledgments

I am indebted to the many people who told me their stories of living through the Great New England Hurricane, especially Harry and Joan Brainerd, Dustin and Jane White, Fred Hunt, Bryce Metcalf, Lois Sherwood, Jim Colby, Allen Britton, Tink and Polly Hood, Fred Spooner, Harold Luce, John Hemenway, and Put Blodgett. My gratitude to Fred Hunt, Jim Colby, Harry Brainerd, and Harold Luce is tempered with sadness; they were instrumental in helping me understand the terror of the storm and have passed away before they could hold this book in their hands.

Some other people you will meet in the book have been enormously generous with their time, particularly Charlie Cogbill and Lourdes Aviles, who put up with an endless stream of follow-up questions, and local weatherman Mark Breen, who gave me a crash course in meteorology.

Much of the information on the salvage program came from the National Archive in Waltham, Massachusetts, a repository of hundreds of boxes of memos and letters of the Northeastern Timber Salvage Administration. The archives at Harvard Forest hold many important records, including before-and-after inventories of the forest's various compartments. Two online archives have also been invaluable: the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) for all things meteorological and the Forest History Society for forestry and the New Deal.

Many individuals, including staff at libraries, historical societies, and other organizations, have helped me find documents and articles for my research and photos for use in the book. Though too many to name, you all have my gratitude.

Ginny Barlow, Dave Paganelli, Mike Batten, and Markus Bradley have helped me manage my woodland and taught me so much about what to look for and how things work in the woods. Everything I write springs from that base of knowledge. Thanks also to my former colleagues at Northern Woodlands magazine, which published an early story based on some of this research. Sarah Smith generously shared what she learned researching her own book, They Sawed Up a Storm. Writer and naturalist Charles Johnson has long championed my work, and I want to thank him publicly for his warm encouragement.

Acknowledgments

My wife, Mary Hays, disrupted her own writing life to join me in my fellowship year at Harvard Forest, traveling home and back with me each week while our restive dog panted in the back seat. She always is my closest and best reader. I've benefited from other readers as well—David Foster, Charlie Cogbill, Lourdes Aviles, Bob Saul, and Andy Morris—who have pointed out my exaggerations and misapprehensions. Finally, many thanks to some key people at Yale University Press: Jean Thomson Black for her enthusiasm for this book and her guidance along the way; Samantha Ostrowski for her steady efficiency; and Dan Heaton for his insightful and subtle editing. All of these people have helped make this a better book. I take sole responsibility for any deficiencies that remain.

This page intentionally left blank

Thirty-Eight

This page intentionally left blank