I have incurred many debts while writing this book. Indeed, it has taken so long to complete that I am certain to forget some of the many kind people who took the time to share their expertise, alert me to sources, correct grievous errors, read drafts, or act as sounding boards. To them I apologize. I honed the logic of this book on such willing and patient sharpening stones as Tim Hitchcock, Robert Shoemaker, Simon Devereaux, Mary Fissell, Donna Andrew, Jeremy Boulton, Olivia Weisser, Matthew Newsom Kerr, Susannah Ottaway, Mark Harrison, Erica Charters, Graham Mooney, Jonathan Reinarz, Paul Slack, Margaret Pelling, and Joanna Innes. The anonymous readers also offered much valued advice in their reports. Naturally, none of them bears responsibility for any blunders that I have persisted in making despite their sage advice. Considerable good fortune came my way when I was welcomed as a visiting fellow by the History Department of Oxford Brookes University in 2011. The entire department deserves my thanks, but especially Alysa Levene and Jane Stevens Crawshaw, who not only made my visit intellectually thrilling but acted as such gracious hosts. Several chapters simply could not have been written without the research conducted on that trip. It was also there, in seminar presentations at Oxford Brookes and at Oxford University’s Wellcome Unit for the History of Medicine, that I first began to shape and articulate the core ideas found in this book. Audiences at too many conferences to name similarly have my gratitude for their many insights, but special mention is owed to the community of the Institute for the History of Medicine at Johns Hopkins, which thoroughly workshopped Chapter 1. I benefited from the hard work and care of many librarians and archivists, including those at the British Library, Bodleian Library, Wellcome Library, London Metropolitan Archives, Royal Free Archive Centre, Westminster Abbey Library and Muniments Room, Guildhall Library, Senate House Library, and the Bata Library at Trent University. I am grateful for the keen editorial eye of Dan Heaton at Yale University Press. Preliminary research was supported by the Social Science and Humanities Research Council of Canada.

My children, Simon and Isabelle, have lived with this book for their entire lives. I thank them for sharing their dad when he has had to travel, for schlepping to England for reasons they cannot possibly have understood at the time, and for making me smile when I come home each evening. And now we come to the point where these acknowledgments must fail, for I am just not a good enough writer to convey my thanks to Kate. While I was in the middle of writing this book life handed our family a terrifying shock. She steered us through it. She encouraged me to continue with my work when doing so was the last thing on my mind. In a very real sense this could not have been written without her. Compared with all that she gives me, dedicating this book to her is a paltry gift, but one I offer with all my love.
Rotten Bodies