First and foremost, I thank all of the dance artists discussed in these pages: for the generosity of your time, the gift of your friendship, and the complexity and integrity of your work. I must offer an additional note of thanks to Justine A. Chambers and Alexa Mardon for inviting me into their own project on Vancouver dance history and for showing me how it really should be done. I am also grateful to all the generous individuals who have allowed me to reproduce their words or their images as part of the telling of this story.

At Simon Fraser University (sfu) I have been blessed to work with students, colleagues, and visiting scholars who share my passion for the Vancouver dance scene and have helped shape it. For their conversation and insights, embodied and otherwise, I thank Megan Andrews, Carolina Bergonzoni, Jennifer Chutter, Carolyne Clare, Henry Daniel, Marla Eist, Judith Garay, Sasha Ivanochko, Rob Kitsos, DD Kugler, Cheryl Prophet, Celeste Snowber, ilvs strauss, Daisy Thompson, Megan Walker-Straight, Britta Wirthmüller, and Meagan Woods. I extend my thanks as well to colleagues Sabine Bitter, Allyson Clay, Arne Eigenfeldt, Kyla Gardiner, Steven Hill, Sky Hopinka, Claudette Lauzon, Cole Lewis, John McFarlane, Laura Marks, Denise Oleksijczuk, Chris Pavsek, Elspeth Pratt, Eldritch Priest, Judy Radul, Simone Rapisarda, Noé Rodriguez, Sabrina Schroeder, Owen Underhill, Wladimiro Woyno, and Jin-me Yoon: for listening to me talk about the ideas in this book; for helping to provide space for the pedagogical elaboration of some of those ideas; and above all for modelling what compelling and thoughtful artmaking, scholarship, and community engagement look like. Nobody integrated all three of those practices better than Ker Wells, and it saddens me that he is no longer with us to contribute his unique vision to Vancouver’s performance ecology.

I have spent more than fifteen years talking with Alana Gerecke about Vancouver dance, to which Alana has herself made significant artistic and critical contributions. My thinking on movement in the city has been enriched immeasurably by Alana’s unique insights, and I hope this book will be read as a companion to Alana’s own forthcoming monograph on Vancouver site dance. A theorist of a different kind of embodied knowledge, Kelsey Blair has nevertheless taught me an immense amount about the transmissibility of technique. I owe everything I know about how to do (and not do) performance ethnography from Dara Culhane: thank you, Dara, for your wisdom and patience in teaching me to think more deeply and more feelingly about the stories of this place. Whatever I have gotten wrong in the telling is my fault alone.

However imperfectly, I have shared ideas from this book at meetings of the Canadian Association for Theatre Research, the American Society for Theatre Research, the Congress on Research in Dance (now the Dance Studies Association), the Canadian Society for Dance Studies, Performance Studies international, the World Dance Critics – Americas, and various additional university and community gatherings. For listening and sharing their feedbback, I wish to thank Megan Andrews, Susan Bennett, Sima Belmar, Seika Boye, T. Nikki Cesare-Schotzko, Mique’l Dangeli, Kate Elswit, Alex Lazaridis Ferguson, Heather Fitzsimmons-Frey, Anne Flynn, Jane Gabriels, Nadine George-Graves, Alana Gerecke, Evadne Kelly, Laura Levin, Allana Lindgren, Susan Manning, Deborah Meyers, Bronwyn Preece, VK Preston, Joyce Rosario, Marlis Schweitzer, Ahalya Satkunarattam, and MJ Thompson.

To Aiko, Angel, Dana, Henry, Katie, Molly, Salome, Tuan, and all the other drop-in members of Barbara Bourget’s dance class at \text{kw} Studios: thank you for the infectious joy of dancing together every week, and for covering my mistakes. Thank you, Barbara, for your insistence on calling those mistakes out. To the undergraduate students of Rob Kitsos’s contemporary technique class, which I have been known to crash (sometimes quite literally): thanks for accommodating me, and also for not laughing.

I first met Jonathan Crago, editor-in-chief at McGill-Queen’s University Press (\text{MQUP}), when he was a student in my maiden graduate seminar at \text{sfu}. The critical insights on cultural theory and performance he articulated back then have only sharpened in the years since, and there is no better testament to this than the many groundbreaking books he has helped shepherd into print. I can’t claim mine will be one of them, but I am nevertheless extremely grateful to Jonathan for his unwavering support of this book (including its somewhat unusual form), and of research in Canadian dance and performance studies more generally. Thanks as well to everyone else at \text{MQUP}, especially Finn Purcell, Kathleen Fraser, Erin Rolfs, and Matthew Kudelka, for their contributions to the production of this book. I am also profoundly indebted to the two peer reviewers who provided anonymous feedback on my manuscript. Such an acknowledgment is standard protocol in our profession, but in their deep and sustained engagement with the work, their critical generosity, and the substance of their suggestions for improvement, there was nothing at all standard about these reviews – and one in particular. I am truly humbled to have had my writing on contemporary Vancouver dance read with such care and I have tried as best I can through my revisions to reciprocate that responsibility to the material I am analyzing.

Finally, I reserve my greatest thanks for Richard Cavell, who has accompanied me to most of the dance performances discussed in this book, and who has supported me emotionally and intellectually during the long process of its completion. Thank you, Richard, for being the best Vancouver dance partner one could hope for.
