Acknowledgments

For their inspiring influence, I would like to thank Robert Brandon, Shelagh Mitchell, Alison Brown, Robert Frost, the late Conrad Russell, Peter Lake, and Glyn Redworth.

Marisa Linton is a Brighton rock and has had her ears patiently chewed off on an almost weekly basis for over two decades. Her wisdom, friendship, and encouragement have been indispensable.

Over the years I have benefited significantly from the guidance given by John Hardman, Peter Campbell, Joël Félix, Guy Rowlands, Munro Price, Barry Coward, Sara Chapman, Carolyn Chapell Lougee, Philip Mansel, Clarissa-Campbell Orr, and David-Kammerling Smith. I have also profited from insightful conversations with Jeroen Duindam, Marcel Loyau, Antonia Fraser, Tom Kaiser, Darryl Dee, Kent Wright, Julie Hardwick, Bill Doyle, Mack Holt, Nigel Aston, and John Miller.

As well as providing much needed employment for several years at Birkbeck, Julian Swann kindly read the manuscript before submission, as did Greg Monahan. Their comments were immeasurably useful, as was the expertise of Jim Collins, who frequently and munificently put it at my disposal.

I am deeply grateful for the assistance provided by the anonymous readers; all the publishing team, in particular Kyla Madden; and heads of the history department at Chichester who have done their best to make some space for research and writing: Hugo Frey and recently retired Sue Morgan – her camaraderie and sagacious advice continue to be greatly appreciated.

Robert Cosials, Jean-Michel Roidot, and the staff at the Bibliothèque Municipale de Versailles were extremely gracious and generous. The original research was carried out thanks to grants and scholarships from
The Huguenot Society, London University’s Central Research Fund, the University of London Institute in Paris, and the British Academy. And research grants from the University of Chichester and the Isobel Thornley Bequest helped with publication costs.

Four friends, of many, deserve a special mention for benevolence beyond belief: Jason Bullmore, Paul Gooch, Tim McHugh, and Jonathan Spangler, who has read countless drafts of the manuscript and sunk countless draughts in fraternity.

My wife, Laura, helped with the bibliography and of course so much more besides. Her patience and support have been invaluable, especially considering that my son, Sebastian, was born while the book was being completed. As enchanting distractions go, he is the supremo.

My family have been wonderful, as ever, with my Mum and late Dad separately providing vital injections of funds to sustain my PhD studies initially, long before the advent of student loans.

Finally, I owe an incalculable debt to my former supervisor, Roger Mettam, without whose unparalleled knowledge and unstinting kindness this project would never have been conceived, let alone finished.
