Research for this book was funded by a Leverhulme Trust Early Career Fellowship. I am grateful to the Trust for providing the space and time for the sort of scholarship that it represents, and I am particularly thankful to Andreas Heiner for his administrative support. I would also like to thank Richard Baggaley of McGill-Queen’s University Press for his considerable help and interest in the project from an early stage. I am especially grateful to Paula Sarson for her patient and thorough editorial work, which has improved the manuscript significantly. Mark Davis continues to be a brilliant mentor, and Adrian Favell has been a strong supporter of my legacy work at the Bauman Institute. I also thank other Bauman Institute members Tom Campbell, Austin Harrington, Ben Hirst, Robert Thornton-Lee, Rodanthi Tzanelli, and Katy Wright for their interest in my work over the years. Eric Ferris, Michael Hviid Jacobsen, William Outhwaite, Max Silverman, and Janet Wolff read and commented on versions of the manuscript, as did Peter Beilharz who is a model of intellectual friendship. I also learned a great deal about Zygmunt and Janina Bauman (and much more) from Bryan Cheyette, Aleksandra Kania, Richard Kilminster, Griselda Pollock, and Arne Johan Vetlesen, and I thank them for their generosity. Izabela Wagner has become a good friend, and I had the good fortune that her monumental biographical work was in its final stages when we met. Similarly, Dariusz Brzeziński’s work on Bauman’s sociology of culture and his Polish-period works has been invaluable. I thank Roxana Barbulescu, Matt Dawson, Helen Finch, Alfia Leiva, and Joe Ruffell for thoughtful discussions, and my dissertation supervisees during the period of my work on the project – Teighan Currie, Mailies Fleming, and Juliette Saetre – were also a source of inspiration.
Some of the contents of this book have been developed and honed in dialogues established at events both in-person and online. In September 2019, I organized a symposium on Modernity and the Holocaust, thirty years on, and thank all the participants for their stimulating contributions. I would particularly like to thank Larry J. Ray, and Jon Catlin, who has been a great transatlantic conversant. I also played a part in organizing a series of online lectures on “Postcolonial Bauman” and took a great deal of influence from Manuela Boatcă, who was very generous in responding to the numerous questions that her reflections provoked in me. I am also grateful to Lisa McCormick for the invitation to take part in an event organized by the British Sociological Association’s Theory Network on Bauman’s life and work. I presented a version of chapter 1 at a hybrid event on intellectual emigration hosted by the Richard Pipes Lab at the Polish Academy of Sciences. An early version of chapter 2 was delivered at an event on sociology and literature at the University of Warwick, and I would like to thank Christine Emmett, Dominika Partyga, and Charles Turner for their comments. I was able to present a paper on Bauman and the West at the very beginning of my fellowship at the University of Leeds and am appreciative to the organizers of the “Decolonial Dialogues” seminar series for the opportunity. The Institute of Philosophy and Sociology at the Polish Academy of Sciences generously hosted my visit in November 2022, and I am grateful that I was able to preview the book in its entirety in a presentation I delivered there.

I would like to thank the entire special collections staff at the Brotherton Library in Leeds for their support of my work in the Papers of Janina and Zygmunt Bauman Archive, especially in the context of enforced remote working, when they ensured access to key documents. I am particularly grateful to Tim Procter, Caroline Bolton, Christopher Grygiel, and Claire Morton, as well as to a number of student interns who made contributions to the project: Karolina Glasek, Robert Irnazarow, Andrew O’Neill, and Lorna Sweeney. Two of these internships were supported by funding from the Q-Step program, and I thank Andrea Denny for her help in facilitating these. Maya Johnston translated an important piece from Hebrew into English for me, and Katarzyna Bartoszyńska translated a number of Polish documents and was also generous in commenting on aspects of my project. Most importantly, I thank the Bauman family for making the archive available to the public, including scholars. The encouragement and enthusiasm of Irena Bauman, Lydia Bauman, and Anna Sfard for my work continues to be deeply appreciated.

My interest in Bauman, and in sociology, was sparked by Sophia Wood, who I was lucky to have as my undergraduate dissertation supervisor at the University of Portsmouth. I am indebted to her for arranging a consequential meeting with Keith Tester, without which this book may never have been written. Keith's death in early 2019 was devastating: he was exemplary of a humane, writerly sociology, and his influence on this book extends well beyond his appearance in the notes.

Finally, forever, endless gratitude to my family. To Mum and Dad, for everything. To Yoshiko, for remaining my closest companion, and for being the best proofreader I know. And to our two daughters, Naima and Serin, who were born over the course of working on this book. In their short lives, they have given me a melancholic hope that we may construct and inhabit a better world.
