ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book would not have been possible without the generosity of my interlocutors at both Christian Concern and Christ Church, who welcomed me into their respective communities with patience, honesty, and unswerving good humour. At Christian Concern, special thanks are owed to Andrea Minichiello Williams, Andrew Marsh, Ade Omooba, and the Christian Legal Centre (CLC) clients who took the time to share their stories with me. Andrea, Andrew, and Pastor Ade—and, indeed, the entire staff team, particularly those referenced within as Annabelle, Carrie, Grace, Jake, John, Louise, and Maria—enabled this project from its earliest stages, opening their doors and giving me access to the world of Christian activism. This act of bravery is one I appreciate deeply.

At Christ Church, thanks are owed to the church staff; to Lucy, who first introduced me to the congregation; to Carol and Leah, with whom I spent so much time studying the Bible; and to Hannah, who went out of her way to introduce me to friends and colleagues. Special thanks also to the members of my women’s Bible study group, who welcomed me with such warmth.

I have had incredible mentors in Fenella Cannell, Matthew Engelke, and Winnifred Fallers Sullivan, all of whom have been incredibly supportive of this project and my career (and me personally, of course). My work has benefitted hugely from their feedback and critique; I hope they recognise their influence on this text. They are the kind of scholars I hope to be.

Fred Appel, Jenny Tan, and the team at Princeton University Press have been enormously helpful in bringing this book about, not least for organising the reviews that so improved the final product. Special thanks to these anonymous reviewers, whose reports strengthened my analysis in myriad ways.

I am grateful to my friends and peers at the London School of Economics, particularly Agustín Diz, Katharine Fletcher Wolstenholme, Juli Qermezi Huang, Megan Laws, and Philip Proudfoot, who offered helpful feedback in seminars and (more often) at the White Horse during my doctoral studies. Thanks also to colleagues at University College London, particularly Timothy Carroll, Lewis Daly, Ashraf Hoque, Dalia Iskander, and Aaron Parkhurst, who encouraged me as I wrote the proposal, and to Alanna Cant and Miranda Sheild Johansson for emotional support (and comic relief) during the wrapping up phase. Finbarr Curtis, Abby Day, Rosalind Hackett, and Anna Strhan all offered helpful feedback at different stages.

My colleagues at the Centre for Religion, Conflict and Globalisation—Brenda Bartelink, Kim Knibbe, Julia Martínez-Ariño, Brenda Mathijsen, Joram Tarusarira and Erin Wilson—have been hugely supportive of this project. I appreciate them immensely, both for the community they’ve created and the wonderful work they do. Similarly, my students at the LSE, UCL, and the University of Groningen continue to inspire me with their enthusiasm, commitment, and good humour; working with them has made me a better scholar.

My greatest debt is owed to those bound by ties of friendship so deep it is kinship and kinship so deep it is friendship. My parents, Bernadette and Peter, have always encouraged my love of books; the fact that I’ve now written one is testament to the three decades of love, support, and encouragement I have received from them. Thank you both for everything. The research on which this book is based would not have been possible without Otso, who not only supported and sustained me in the field but hosted dinner parties, attended church, and generally integrated into my field site. I honestly couldn’t have done it without you. Kiitos kaikesta. Lisa stuck with me from start to finish, from helping me find a field site to talking through each chapter I produced. Marie, Jean-Yves, Daire, Kimberly, Clementine, Constance, and Agathe provided endless support (and welcome distraction). Thank you all. Finally, special thanks are owed to Richard, who read every draft twice and reads me more generously than anyone. (I guess it’s finally true that you’ve been ‘reading a lot of anthropology lately’.)

This research was made possible by grants from the Economic and Social Research Council and the London School of Economics.

Thanks for your patience, everyone! Now that the book is done, I promise to be more fun at parties . . .
