For better or worse, history remains a single-author discipline, but that disguises the village needed to research, write, and revise. This book would have been impossible without the encouragement, assistance, and criticism of many individuals who made the process of writing a monograph not only possible, but also highly enjoyable. First and foremost, I am grateful to David Blackbourn, Alison Frank Johnson, Harriet Ritvo, and Emma Rothschild, whose guidance and unwavering support have been invaluable throughout my time working on various iterations of the manuscript. I also owe a great debt to Sunil Amrith, Lydia Barnett, Lino Camprubi, Mark Carey, Lorraine Daston, Alejandra Dubcovsky, Alexander Gall, Matthias Heymann, Fredrik Albritton Jonsson, Charles Maier, Ian Miller, William O’Reilly, Libby Robin, Amberle Sherman, Victor Seow, Josh Specht, and Audra J. Wolfe, who provided comments, advice, and inspiration at different stages of the project. The same goes for the many co-panelists and audience members who engaged with my work at countless workshops and conferences on four different continents. I also extend my gratitude to the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript, whose notes and suggestions were as indispensable and important as they were challenging. Finally, I thank the editors at Princeton University Press, and especially Quinn Fusting and Priya Nelson, whose enthusiasm for the project made it become a book.

The extensive archival research necessary for this project was made possible by generous funding from the CLIR Mellon Fellowship for Dissertation Research in Original Sources and the Deutscher Akademischer Austauschdienst (DAAD). The Center for History and Economics and the Center for European Studies at Harvard University provided additional funding, while the American Council of Learned Societies, the Mellon Foundation, the Hellman Fellows Program, and the Hamburg Institute for Advanced Study provided me with much-needed time and space to work on various rounds of revisions.

My work would have been impossible without the help, knowledge, and patience of the many librarians and archivists whom I encountered during my research. In particular, I would like to thank the staff at Harvard’s Widener Library, the library of the Max Planck Institute for the History of Science, the Tomás Rivera Library at UCR, the Bundesarchiv in Berlin, the archives of the Deutsches Museum, the Staatsbibliothek Berlin, the Bayerische Staatsbibliothek, the Geheimes Staatsarchiv in Berlin, the Niedersächsisches Landesarchiv, the Archives Nationales d’Outre-Mer, the archive of the Académie des Sciences in Paris, and the Archives Diplomatiques in La Courneuve.

I would also like to express my gratitude to my friends, who have stood by my side with “Rat und Tat” and have provided both indispensable advice and welcome distractions during periods of slow progress. I am especially indebted to Scott Phelps, who has been an inspiring force for many years, encouraging me to think more deeply about the larger implications of my work. Lastly, I would like to thank my family. My parents Alena and Frank Lehmann have supported my academic career with great endurance and enthusiasm. My New Mexican “parents” Ingrid and Robert Upton taught me not only English, but also a love for deserts. And my wife Eva Bitran has read through so many drafts of this book that she may know it better than I do. She has endured my bad moods, encouraged me when I needed it most, and celebrated each milestone, no matter how small. Over the past three years my two sons, Elias Leander and Lino Antonin, have joined my supporters’ section, but are probably a little disappointed that there are not enough pictures in this book.

Finally, I would like to dedicate this work to the late Maya Peterson, whose intellectual acuity and enthusiasm motivated me every step on the way and whose tragic passing came as an utter shock. I will continue to miss her as both a remarkable colleague and a dear friend.
