ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Writing this book has been a very rewarding experience, and I have many people to thank. However, I must first acknowledge that nearly all the writing and editing of this book took place during the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic. While living through a once-in-a-century global health crisis was certainly bleak and disorienting, I have been very fortunate to have stable academic employment and ample resources to complete this project. Reliance on precarious labor is one of the great stains on higher education (and society in general), and the pandemic has only exacerbated these circumstances. No words can adequately express my gratitude for those in our society who make things work.

This project began as a doctoral dissertation at the Ohio State University. In that undertaking, I accumulated many debts, beginning with my coadvisers, Chris Gelpi and Alex Wendt. Chris and Alex encouraged me to pursue a project that was politically important, provocative, and that would have real stakes. They both bore the brunt of my one thousand earlier, worse ideas and never wavered in their support of this project. Thank you for letting me gamble.

William Minozzi, Bear Braumoeller, and Inés Valdez also served on the committee, and each provided guidance that greatly enhanced this book. William was the first faculty member I met when I arrived in Columbus. He has been a mentor, adviser, but most of all, a great friend, and he has always generously made the time to be there for me whenever needed. Bear was the person who convinced me to come to Ohio State, and he has always been more generous with his time and feedback than he needed to be. Coauthoring with Bear taught me the ropes of doing academic work, and I am grateful for that opportunity. Finally, this book would not exist without Inés. She implored me to read Du Bois, and I cannot overemphasize how much I benefited from her careful eye, her insightful comments, and her advice on book writing and professional development.
This project also gained from many others’ insights and support, including Bentley Allan, Larry Baum, Rob Bond, Philippe Bourbeau, Aisha Bradshaw, Ben Campbell, Austin Carson, Skyler Cranmer, Raphael Cunha, Marina Duque, Errol Henderson, Rick Herrmann, Dan Kent, Ben Kenzer, Vlad Kogan, Marcus Kurtz, Kyle Larson, Adam Lauretig, Michael Lopate, Will Massengill, Ben McKeans, Jennifer Mitzen, Carolyn Morgan, John Mueller, Lauren Muscott, Michael Neblo, Irfan Nooruddin, Tom Nelson, Ruthie Pertsis, Jan Pierskalla, Amanda Robinson, Randy Schweller, Greg Smith, Alex Thompson, Leyla Tosun, Pete Tunkis, Linnea Turco, Daniel Verdier, and Iku Yoshimoto. Special thanks go to several members of my small-but-mighty graduate school cohort: Jose Fortou, Austin Knuppe, Reed Kurtz, Anna Meyerrose, and Avery White. They are great friends who have all been instrumental to this project in many ways, from its conception to the final manuscript.

In addition, this book would not have been possible without the training I received at Johns Hopkins and the London School of Economics. I went to college expecting to study history, but the guidance of Steven David, Dan Deudney, Joel Grossman, Siba Grovogui, Hitomi Koyama, and Khalid Kurji convinced me that I should study political science. It was also a stroke of fortune that I ended up at the LSE for a master’s degree because without Iver Neumann I certainly would not have gotten a PhD in IR. But most of all, I must acknowledge the incredible education I received in the West Des Moines Community School District. My teachers provided a peerless foundation for success that highlights the importance of investing in public education.

I presented earlier versions of parts of this project at the following institutions: Georgetown University; George Washington University; Harvard University; Merton College, Oxford; Université Laval; and the Universities of Florida and Minnesota, as well as at various meetings of the American Political Science Association, the European Political Science Association, the International Studies Association, the Midwest Political Science Association, and the Millennium Journal Conference. I am grateful for the opportunities and for all the valuable, incisive feedback that participants provided.

Turning to the present, I wrote this book at the University of Florida, and the Department of Political Science has been a wonderful academic home since 2019. I have benefited greatly from sharing a genuinely pluralist department with such a talented group of scholars across the subfields of political science. I want to specifically highlight the influence of Hannah Alarian, Badredine Arfi, Michael Bernhard, Aida Hozić, and Ben Smith on this project. As department chair, Dan Smith has also provided generous support and advice. Nicole Figueroa, Ellie Schauer, and Eve Vanagas also provided essential research and administrative support.

At Princeton University Press, I am indebted to Bridget Flannery-McCoy, who has been enthusiastic about this project ever since our first conversation.
Bridget’s guidance has been instrumental in making the manuscript better.
I also must thank Alena Chekanov and Natalie Baan, who were decisive in seeing the project through to the finish line. I am also appreciative of Jennifer McClain for copyediting the manuscript and Enid Zafran for compiling the index. Despite its remaining faults, this project also benefited immensely from the remarkable feedback of two anonymous reviewers and Errol Henderson (again). Errol’s comments left an immeasurable impact, and I cannot thank him enough for his critical eye and support.

This book is dedicated to my family. Sadly, my grandmother Audrey Rosenberg and grandfather Stanley Engman passed away while the manuscript was going through the review and production processes. While I’m devastated that they will never get to read it, I take comfort from remembering all the time we spent together and their unfailing love and encouragement, even when I was skeptical that things would work out. Embarrassingly, I was mortified that my grandmother found out that the manuscript was under consideration—I’m too superstitious for my own good—but I often go back and read the text message she sent after I explained that there was “probably a million-to-one chance” that Princeton would publish it: “We won’t say anything—just always proud of each step along the way.”

The rest of my family has also been a source of support throughout this process. Unfortunately, there are far too many members to acknowledge individually, but I will highlight a few notables. I struggle to find the words to express my love and admiration for Shari Engman and Harlan Rosenberg (the original Dr. Rosenberg). They continue to give me so much for which I am thankful, and I look forward to sharing many more Iowa football Saturdays with them. Ken and Denise Coyne are relatively new additions to the family, but they continue to love me like their own son. My stepparents, Jeff Chapman, Keely Rosenberg, and Randy Cain, also provided immeasurable encouragement throughout the years, and I appreciate all they have done for me. I am also fortunate to have two wonderful parents, Kim and Steve, whose faith in me has always outstripped my own. They have provided a foundation of support, inspiration, and understanding throughout my life that I could never possibly repay. I can only hope to pay it forward and try to live up to their example. Thank you for believing in me and letting me follow my own path.

Finally, my wife and partner, Colleen, has been my truest companion for nearly a decade. I met Colleen the first week I moved to Columbus for graduate school, and she has been my closest confidante this entire time (along with our dog, Quigby, of course). Quite frankly, I could not have written this book without her. She tolerated, to varying degrees, my penchant for obsessive work during the spring/summer of 2020, but she never let me forget what was important in life and rightfully pushed me to relax once in a while. I am eternally grateful for her insights, intellect, support, and sacrifices, and I cannot imagine spending life with anyone else.

Andrew S. Rosenberg
Gainesville, FL
January 2022
UNDESIRABLE IMMIGRANTS