ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book has taken far too long to write, and along the way I have incurred many debts. The most important of these debts is to the late Professor Philip Cottrell, my mentor and former colleague, to whom this book is dedicated. Conversations with Phil shaped the early stages of this project and helped me think through the contents of the Minutes of the Committee of Inspection and consider their meaning. I shall always be grateful for those conversations and for Phil’s capacity to critique and challenge with generosity, kindness and humour.

A conversation with David Kynaston convinced me that I could write this book as a ‘day in the life’. Although there were many times I regretted the decision to follow that format, I was, in the end, pleased with the outcome and enjoyed the challenge of trying to make it work and make sense. I am grateful also to Natalie Roxburgh for many formative conversations about the Bank, its spaces and their meaning.

The Bank of England Archive and Museum were unfailingly attentive and supportive over the many visits and enquiries that were required for this project, even though I imagine they never thought it would actually see the light of day. I also owe a debt to the University of Hertfordshire and former colleagues in the History Group for research time, support and collegiality.

My thinking about the late eighteenth-century Bank was stimulated by conversations with many friends and colleagues including Ann Carlos, Julian Hoppit, Larry Klein, Inger Leemans, James Macdonald, Ciara Meehan, Renaud Morieux, Larry Neal, Malcolm Noble, Patrick O’Brien, David Ormrod, Helen Paul, Patrick Walsh, Carl Wennerlind, Koji Yamamoto, Nuala Zahedieh, and the always delightful participants of the Money, Power and Print Colloquiums. These conversations have certainly improved what follows, as did the suggestions of the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript. Any remaining infelicities and errors are mine alone.

Lastly, but certainly not least, I am grateful to Princeton University Press, and especially to Josh Drake, for their willingness to believe, on the slightest of evidence, that the manuscript eventually would be finished.
