ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

IT IS A DELIGHT to acknowledge the many debts I have accrued in the course of writing this book. I gratefully acknowledge funding for research and writing from the American Council of Learned Societies, the U.S. Department of Education, Harvard University’s Center for History and Economics, the Mellon Foundation, Princeton University’s History Department and Institute for International and Regional Studies, and the Social Science Research Council. A grant from the Princeton University Press offered through an innovative program for first-time authors was crucial to getting this book over the finish line. I am deeply indebted to the archivists at the State Archive of the Russian Federation, the Manuscript Division at the Russian State Library, the Russian State Archive of the Economy, the Russian State Archive of Socio-Political History, the Russian State Historical Archive, the Central Archive of the City of Moscow, the Central Historical Archive of Moscow, and the Central State Archive of St. Petersburg, all of whom provided important guidance to the papers of a jumbled time, during which standard filing systems did not always obtain.

As it is with great teachers, I will never be able to repay what I owe to Stephen Kotkin. Nevertheless, I register my abiding gratitude here for all he has taught me, for the rigor and empathy he brings to study of history, for his unwavering support, dedication, and optimism. Ekaterina Pravilova taught me new ways of thinking about Russian history and new methods for accessing the history of the material world. She has been an essential interlocutor throughout my work on this book and generously agreed to read several of its chapters. Michael Gordin’s clarity of mind and collegiality have helped me at many turns and I am grateful for his encouragement over the years. At Berkeley, I benefited from seminars with John Connelly, David Henkin, and Yuri Slezkine, who posed questions about Soviet history and what neighbors should expect of one another that left a deep impression. As an undergraduate, I received a summer stipend to work at a nonprofit on the South Side of Chicago directed by Sokoni Karanja, who suggested a project: that I interview the residents of apartment buildings owned by the city, which the city planned soon to demolish. The questions raised in these encounters continue to guide my research and teaching, and I am deeply grateful to Dr. Karanja for welcoming me into his work. When I returned to school, I enrolled in a one-of-a-kind course on the history of housing and urbanism taught by the late Robert Guttmann, which provided an enriching foundation for my later inquiries.

This book began on Kazakova Street, in the company of an antique dining table that miraculously survived the turmoil described in these pages, and of the family who gathers around it. I am one of many travelers to have found respite in the Zhivovs’ magical apartment; given its inhabitants, I am probably one of many to have found a dissertation topic there. In the best tradition of their parents, Lina Zhivova and her siblings have not only fed and housed me all these years, they have brought me along on their lives. My gratitude to them all is boundless. In the archives, it was a privilege to work alongside so many erudite and welcoming historians, including Seth Bernstein, Miriam Dobson, Sylvain Dufraisse, and James Heinzen. Katja Bruisch shared her capacious knowledge of RGAE as well as her friendship. Juliette Cadiot helped me get my footing intellectually and practically as I began this project, and has been a role model in the art of thoughtful and generous scholarship ever since.

Not every one wants to spend their twenties in a small town in New Jersey. But in the company of Ryan Davis, Mayhill Fowler, Jamie Kreiner, Kyrill Kunakhovich, Elidor Mëhilli, Dael Norwood, Jamie Reuland, Chris Shannon, and Fadzilah Yahaya, Princeton always felt like a big place, rich with ideas and companionship. At Harvard, I had the good fortune to talk the history of real estate with Alexia Yates, and to absorb the fascinating scholarship on offer at the Center for History and Economics, where Emma Rothschild exercises her unique gift for cultivating scholarly connections across disciplines and fields. I have profited greatly from conversations and conferences with these scholars, at the Center and now in other spaces, especially those organized by Rohit De and Catherine Evans. Seth Bernstein and Elidor Mëhilli generously read drafts of the introduction, each with characteristic lucidity.

At New York University, I have been fortunate to join a thriving community devoted to the study of Russia. Anne Lounsbery and Eliot Borenstein have provided advice, encouragement, and good humor at every step. Thank you to Leydi Rofman for making everything run smoothly, Alla Roylance for incredible skill and speed in tracking down obscure sources, and Evelina Men-delevich for company. In the history department, Stephen Gross, Monica Kim (now at Wisconsin-Madison), Tatiana Linkhoeva, Andrew Needham, Susanah Romney, and Andrew Sartori read draft chapters with acumen. Karl Appuhn, Ayşe Baltacioglu-Brammer, Jane Burbank, Rossen Djagalov, Stef Geroulanos, Becky Goetz, Ilya Kliger, Yanni Kotsonis, Kim Phillips-Fein (now at Columbia), and Brandon Schechter served as sounding boards, suggested readings, and posed questions that sharpened my thinking. Robyn d’Avignon did all this and more; her camaraderie, wisdom, and careful readings of much of this book have been invaluable.

This book has benefited from the opportunity to present it at a number of institutions and other forums. I spent a fruitful month as a visiting scholar at the École des hautes études en sciences sociales, where I benefited from seminars with Juliette Cadiot, Sabine Dullin, and Alessandro Stanziani. For invitations and enjoyable visits over the years I am grateful to Jeff Hardy, Charis Marantzidou, Stephen Norris, Benjamin Schenk, and Melissa Stockdale, and to audiences at Brigham Young University, the Miami University of Ohio, The University of Oklahoma, the Penn Economic History Forum/Russian History and Culture Workshop, Georgetown University, and Sciences Po. Conversations at these and other meetings with Rachel Applebaum, Betty Banks, Xenia Cherkaev, Franziska Exeler, Anna Ivanova, Boris Kolonitskii, Eric Lohr, Clara Mattei, Liudmila Novikova, Alex Oberlander, Bhavani Raman, Aaron Retish, and Anna Safronova stimulated new ideas about the entangled histories of revolution, law, and economic life. Michael David-Fox and Peter Holquist offered incisive critique and useful suggestions at the very earliest presentations of my research, and have continued to do so on many occasions in all the years since then. Trevor Perri brought an ideal balance of rigor and sensitivity to this manuscript, and I am grateful for his clarifying interventions. I am grateful to the incredible staff at Princeton University Press, not just for bringing this book to fruition, but for supporting my work on it in so many different ways. Priya Nelson steered the manuscript through every stage of this process with an awe-inspiring combination of intelligence and skill. Emma Wagh has kept the manuscript, and me, in line with enthusiasm and efficiency. I am grateful to Nathan Carr for guiding production, and especially for matching this text with Anna Badkhen, whose skill in improving it has been matched only by her good humor. My thanks are due to the two anonymous readers of the manuscript, for their thoughtful engagement with this work. I am grateful to all the series editors for the confidence they showed in the manuscript, especially Emma Rothschild, who shepherded it through the first steps, and Jeremy Adelman, who offered clarifying advice when I most needed it.
April Williams made it possible for me to write this book, taking care of my children with skill and superhuman reliability amid a global pandemic. My thanks to Neva Durand, Charlotte Walker-Said, Johanna Winant, and Alexandra Shaw for their companionship in writing and life, and to Chris and Jay LeGore, Judith Grace, and Jeffrey Mabee for making life in Maine the way it is. I am grateful to my family, Chuck and Karen Whisler, Bill Whisler, Carrie Lee, George Lee, Rachel Levy, Catherine Hinman, Francesca O’Donnell, and Nicholas O’Donnell for their constant encouragement and generosity, and especially to Roger Lee, for making Belfast my home, and to my brother Colin, for looking out for me even still. My husband Ben vowed that, if it meant I finished this book even one moment sooner, I did not have to thank him in these acknowledgments. Combined with his steadfast love, encouragement, wit, and the long days he spent alone with our children, this made all the difference. In my wildest dreams I could never have conjured up children as wonderful as Henry and Vivian. I marvel every day at my incredible good fortune to be their mother. This book is for my mother, Gail, who died as I was just beginning it. I could never have started, let alone finished, without her bottomless well of confidence in me, her example of diligence, her joy in our lives together, her curiosity about the world—in short, without her great love.
