Surat al-Baqara has been a wellspring of discovery and inspiration for me: first, when writing my doctoral dissertation, entitled “Coherence in the Qurʾan: Repetition and Narrative Structure in Surat al-Baqara”; and second, when rewriting it for this monograph. In addition to the thought-provoking qualities of this extraordinary text, many outstanding individuals have contributed to the successful completion of this monograph, and to them I express my heartfelt appreciation. I begin by recognizing the contributions of Malak Ḥifni Nāṣif (d. 1918), Hudā Shaʿrāwī (d. 1947), Nabawiyya Mūsā (d. 1951), Durriyya Shafīq (d. 1975), and all the pioneers of the Islamic feminist movement in Egypt, without whose struggle to bring education to girls, I may never have learned to read. I also acknowledge their contemporary counterparts whose scholarship has helped to develop the field of Islamic studies, particularly in the areas of hermeneutics and Islamic feminism. The ones who have inspired me, befriended me, and/or helped to shape my thinking the most include Amina Wadud, Laleh Bakhtiar, Ziba Mir-Hosseini, Jasmin Zine, Ayesha Siddiqua Chaudhry, Aisha Geissinger, Maliha Chishti, Omaima Abu Bakr, Mulki al-Sharmani, Asma Afsaruddin, and Laury Silvers.

With regard to my dissertation, which prefigured this book, I thank my many teachers, friends, and colleagues in the Department of Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations at the University of Toronto. Foremost in this group is my thesis supervisor, Todd Lawson, who offered me excellent advice and academic guidance at every stage of my work. He also shared with me his expertise on the Qurʾan and on Islamic thought during my years of graduate studies. It is he who first drew my attention to the word “crescendo,” which figures so strongly in this heavily revised monograph.
I owe a special thanks to my committee members for their painstaking review of my dissertation and for being such excellent teachers over the years. Walid Saleh taught me how to approach the classical tafsīr commentaries and brought me to an appreciation of the breadth and sophistication of this tradition. Sebastian Günther shared with me some of his extensive knowledge of the classical Arabic sources of Islamic thought, particularly those related to education. On the Biblical side of my education, I am deeply indebted to R. Theodore Lutz for teaching me almost everything I know about the Biblical Hebrew language and how to analyze its poetry. It was during my study of the Psalms that I first came across inclusios and realized their importance for the study of Surat al-Baqara. I am also profoundly grateful to my external examiner, Angelika Neuwirth, for her valuable insights, particularly in relation to the diachronic approaches. My dissertation was made possible by a University of Toronto doctoral fellowship. I am also indebted to my school in Cairo, the Deutsche Evangelische Oberschule, where I learned the German language at an early age, without which I would not have had access to some of the ground-breaking scholarship upon which my work is founded.

The journey of turning my dissertation into a book and the numerous revisions, additions, and deletions that it entailed also received support. I owe a special thank you to Katherine Bullock for her thorough reading and invaluable feedback in the final stages of the manuscript’s editing. She has come to my aid at a critical juncture of my academic life on more than one occasion. I also owe thanks to my friends and colleagues at Emmanuel College of Victoria University at the University of Toronto, who contribute to a working environment of collegiality and scholarly excellence that is conducive to intellectual dynamism. I am particularly grateful to Pamela Couture, who went out of her way to support this work, giving me valuable feedback on my initial book proposal to McGill-Queen’s University Press. I also owe thanks to Mark Toulouse and Terence Donaldson for introducing me to Christine Mitchell, who made publication of this volume possible, and to my excellent editorial team at McGill-Queen’s, led by Kyla Madden, Ryan Van Huijstee, and Robert Lewis. My daughter Malak El-Tahry spent many hours indexing the book. Two anonymous reviewers for the press also provided me with superb feedback, which has helped me to fine-tune this manuscript.

Without an audience, no author can see her work come alive and touch the hearts and minds of people. I take this opportunity to thank the Noor Cultural Centre, its president, Samira Kanji, and its young coordinators, Azeezah and Khadijah Kanji, for allowing me a platform to disseminate my work outside of the purely academic milieu, and the Canadian Council of Muslim Women and its executive director, Alia Hogben, who have always had my back in my many endeavours. I also express my appreciation to Shari Golberg and Susan Harrison, with whom I have worked across faith traditions on various occasions for more than a decade, reading texts and bringing them to a larger audience. Surat al-Baqara has often featured in these diverse initiatives.

Finally, I express my deepest gratitude to my mother, Zeinab Hanem Aboul Fetouh, and my sister, Jehan Reda, for their unwavering support of me and my children, as well as to my brother, Omar Reda, and my late father, Ismail Reda, for their encouragement and belief in me. My sister and my brother were my first nonspecialist readers, providing me with pointers to make the book more comprehensible to the general public. Their spouses, Akram Reda and Laila Marei, also lent valuable support throughout my al-Baqara venture. Last but not least, I owe a very special thank you to my husband, Yehia El-Tahry, for his constant support and many sacrifices, as well as to our beloved daughters, Naila, Malak, Lenah, and Jasmin Zeinab, for forgoing many precious hours of family time and motherly care. Also in my thoughts are my nieces, Hedayat and Zein Reda, and my nephews, Ismail, Hussein, and Ali Reda, who are always in my heart, even though they are an ocean away. This book is dedicated to my daughters, nieces, and nephews with the hope that their generation may find delight in the radiant Surat al-Baqara.
