Acknowledgments

This study originated as a Ph.D. dissertation in the Department of English, Dalhousie University, under the supervision of Rowland Smith. The manuscript was revised and prepared for publication while I was a Post-doctoral Fellow at the Calgary Institute for the Humanities. I would like to thank Rowland Smith for encouraging and overseeing my interest in Lewis, William H. Pritchard, for his contribution as external reader, and also Harold Coward (Director of the Calgary Humanities Institute) for intellectual and institutional support, and for his recommendation of McGill-Queen’s University Press to me.

At McGill-Queen’s, thanks are due to Peter Blaney and Joan McGilvray, editors, and to Käthe Roth for her insightful and comprehensive copy-editing. I am especially grateful to the readers for McGill-Queen’s and for the Canadian Federation for the Humanities. Their responses to the manuscript were receptive to my argument and productive of suggestions that substantially improved the text. Sincere thanks also to the CFH Aid to Scholarly Publications Programme for a subvention that made publication possible.

Acknowledgments

Finally, a necessarily inadequate expression of gratitude to Ann Wetmore, whose interest and support were crucial during the most difficult stages of my work on Lewis.