This series offers both practical and theoretical perspectives on governance and public management. It marries the insights of practitioners and researchers, providing a window on practical developments and initiatives as well as leading-edge thinking throughout the world.

Topics covered in this series may include: measuring the achievements of public sector reform, the organization and structure of government, the legislative-executive-public service relationship, the role of central agencies, horizontal coordination for greater policy coherence, accountability, organizational effectiveness in the public sector, service standards and quality, leadership in the public sector, and the ethics and values of public service.

The Canadian Centre for Management Development is an agency of the Government of Canada established to provide executive development and to “study and conduct research into the theory and practice of public management,” as well as to “encourage a greater awareness in Canada of issues related to public sector management and the role and functions of government.” This publication series is part of a wider research and publication program, including a range of activities such as action research programs, fellowships, and the CCMD International Governance Network.
This page intentionally left blank