Acknowledgments

No note on the text, or any part of the process working up to it, would be complete without mentioning my debt of gratitude to Phyllis Rider Adelman, my wife. Her insistence on getting things right – her tireless indenture behind the scenes – kept me from fatuities and errors too embarrassing to enumerate. And my debt of gratitude to Elaine Fowler Palencia, whose knowledge of literature and language, and the unwearied freshness she brought to editing these pages, also helped me to exceed myself.

Thanks are also due to Daniel S. Wong, my research assistant during the whole tenure of this process. Thanks, Dan. And to Franklin Ridgway for his help this past year.

My gratitude also to Susan Firestone Hahn, editor of TriQuarterly, for publishing my essay on Don DeLillo, which was taken from an earlier draft of these pages.

As for Mark Abley, who read the manuscript for McGill-Queen’s University Press, I must borrow an image from Pynchon for his delight at my riding my winged pig through the ether. I’m also grateful to the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, especially Curtis Perry, Head of English, for supporting this book.
