This book is the culmination of two decades of work in the area of religious freedom. It is intended to appeal to a broad audience: historians, political scientists, lawyers, and religious leaders and adherents. I have tried to keep legal jargon to a minimum, which is a challenge given that I am a lawyer by training. However, I have a love of history and have thoroughly enjoyed exploring details of events from Canada's past.

I want to take the opportunity to thank the academics who nourished my interest in history and law and trained me to research and write in these areas. First, thanks to Professor Craig Simpson at Western University. Although he told me my writing was boring, he encouraged me to keep at it. Second, I owe a huge debt of gratitude to Professor Lourens du Plessis, my promoter at the University of Stellenbosch, South Africa, who greatly encouraged my research on religious freedom.

My most profound thank you is to Dr Don Buckingham, my husband, supporter and reader for just about everything I write. Truly, I could not have done this without you.

Many thanks as well to my research assistants, Nadine Tepper, Jessie Legaree, and Romalie Murphy. I appreciate your detailed focus.

Thanks to those who read and commented on earlier drafts of chapters. This includes Professor Richard Moon, Professor Angela Campbell, David M. Brown, Peter Menzies, Aileen Van Ginkel, Robert Hayhoe, and Ed Whitcomb. I also appreciate the detailed comments and suggestions I received from my reviewers. I am very grateful for my McGill-Queen's University Press editor, Jacqueline Mason, and copy editor, Joanne Muzak, as well as the series editor, Donald Akenson. I appreciate your efforts and suggestions for making this a better book. I remain responsible for any errors and omissions.

The research benefited from a Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council grant, which assisted with the preliminary research.
