Acknowledgments

This book is the result of vision and commitment by many people. The political leaders of the members of the Land Claims Agreements Coalition appreciated fully the need to mark and commemorate the 250th anniversary of the Royal Proclamation of 1763 and were enthusiastic about doing so through a public symposium. Having already organized four national conferences since its establishment in 2003, the coalition had developed the expertise and experience to mount the symposium. Patti Black and her colleagues at Consilium most ably took care of the logistics and organization. With the addition of the papers by Terry Fenge and Alastair Campbell, this book is the formal outcome of that symposium.

The saying that “only busy people have time” seems particularly apt in the case of the symposium presenters, many very senior in their respective fields of endeavour. All provided thought-provoking and easy-to-read manuscripts based on oral remarks each delivered at the symposium. We thank them all. We also thank Mark Aby and Philip Cercone at McGill-Queen’s University Press, who were immediately enthusiastic about a book to commemorate and address the long-term impacts of the Royal Proclamation of 1763. Rebecca Shurib formatted the papers, and Alastair Campbell prepared the bibliography. Figures 7.1 to 7.5 are derived in part from earlier maps prepared by Articulate Eye Design, Saskatoon. The Walter and Duncan Gordon Foundation provided a grant to the Land Claims Agreements Coalition to assist in the publication of this book.

The coalition was particularly pleased that McGill-Queen’s University Press agreed to take on this publishing project, for this press has more Aboriginal titles to its credit than any other university press in North America. We also thank our home institutions, Nunavut Tunngavik Inc. and Nisga’a Lisims Government, for enabling us to take on this book project, and our colleagues in these organizations and in all members of the Land Claims Agreements Coalition, far too numerous to identify individually.
