Acknowledgments

The research and writing of this book has been a great privilege. I am indebted to many people for their kind and thoughtful encouragement, for directing me toward useful stories, poems, and articles, and for sharing their thoughts on the importance of time to many aspects of life. The seed for this project was planted by a student of mine who, upon reading Emily Carr’s description in Klee Wyck of Indigenous grave markers that round the time of death to the nearest century, suggested that perhaps “time isn’t important to them.” Like so many of my own extemporaneous comments, this one contained both an error and an opportunity for further thinking. The particular focusing question that would guide this thinking came to me while reading W.H. New’s book Land Sliding, in which he seeks to understand “how various configurations of land function in literature (and so in Canadian culture at large) to question or confirm configurations of power.” What would happen, I thought, if one were to ask a similar question about configurations of time?

For their enduring kindness and expert advice in helping me to complete this project, I am particularly indebted to Lorraine York, Pamela Banting, and Daniel Coleman. I could not have hoped to work alongside such supportive and knowledgeable ambassadors for critical generosity. I am deeply indebted to the members of the editorial team and other departments at McGill-Queen’s University Press for orchestrating the transformation of this project into its final form; in particular I thank Kyla Madden for her sustained attention to the book and for allowing me to benefit from her expertise, as well as Kate Baltais for her skilled copyediting, and Ruth Pincoe for creating the index. I am grateful as well to many current and former members of the Department of English and Cultural Studies at McMaster University, including Roger Hyman, Erin Aspenlieder, Jessica Barr, Peter Walmsley, Jeffery Donaldson, Matthew Zantingh, Matthew Dorrell, Michael Mikulak, Malissa Phung, Antoinette Somo, Ilona Forgo-Smith, Bianca James, and Aurelia Gatto; members of the Department of English at the University of Calgary, including Bart Beaty, Rofina Groebmair, Brigitte Clarke, and Anne Jaggard; my new colleagues in the Centre for Humanities at Athabasca University; and colleagues from other departments and institutions, including Bryan Jung, Diana Brydon, and Nicholas Bradley. I also thank my colleagues at the Time and Globalization Working Group: Liam Stockdale, Susie O’Brien, Tony Porter, and Y. Rachel Zhou; the members of the “Cultures of Time in Canada” seminar at the University of Calgary in 2012: Jennifer Dubon, Jessica Hawkins, Kyla Ricard, Maxine Bennett, and Nicholas McCormick; and the two anonymous reviewers whose close and insightful attention to earlier drafts of this book enabled me to make a much more worthy contribution to knowledge. I have been tremendously fortunate to work within such supportive scholarly communities, and I gratefully acknowledge that this book on the topic of time, as well as the other projects I have worked on alongside it, owe their existence to the sustained and generous gift of time from many colleagues.

I would also like to thank Lisa Szabo-Jones, Pamela Banting, Richard Pickard, Cate Sandilands, and Rob Boschman for fostering the invaluable scholarly community of ALECC (Association for Literature, Environment, and Culture in Canada); the many additional ALECC members who responded to my listserv query about ideas of time; Laurie Ricou and the staff at Canadian Literature for inviting me to speak on this topic at their 50th Anniversary Gala in Vancouver in 2009; and Athabasca University, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, the Ontario Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities, and the Awards to Scholarly Publications Program at the Federation for the Humanities and Social Sciences for generously funding my work, allowing me the luxury of time that is always necessary for research and writing. I am grateful to my endlessly supportive family: my mother Carol, whose skill and generosity as a parent, a teacher, and a librarian inspired me to pay close attention to works of literature from a young age; my sister Carrie; my father Bruce; my extended family; the Boyd family; and my son Jamie (who was born several years into this project and already knows the difference between a mainspring and a balance wheel).

This book is dedicated to Niki Boyd. If the book has given meaning to my hours at the keyboard, your generous companionship and infinite patience give meaning to all of those moments that make up the wider arc of my time in this world. Thank you for reminding me of the present.

An early version of my vision for this project, drawing mainly from chapter 1, but with variations, appears as “Thoughts on Time-Based Readings of Canadian Literature and Culture” in English Studies in Canada 36.2–3 (2010). My readings of works by Gabrielle Roy and Catherine Bush at the end of chapter 2 appear with minor variations as “Subjective Time and the Challenge of Social Synchronization: Gabrielle Roy’s The Road Past Altamont and Catherine Bush’s Minus Time” in Canadian Literature 223 (Winter 2014).
