

Acknowledgments

In the long process of writing this book, I have benefited from the support, inspiration, and critical input of a large number of people. They have, each in their own way, contributed to my understanding of what it means to bear witness.

The book began as an independent study with Chris Straayer early in my graduate career at New York University. As the project morphed into a dissertation, her deep commitment to my scholarship, coupled with her encouragement to take intellectual risks, has nourished this work all the way to its present form. Furthermore, her dedication to using teaching and scholarship to help sustain queer media from the margins has served as a powerful model for my own practice. Other faculty members at New York University provided vital insight and guidance, particularly those who served on my dissertation committee: Toby Miller was an important early influence on my graduate studies, while Anna McCarthy would consistently ask the right questions, the difficult ones that you dread because you know they need to be addressed. I was also very fortunate to have Ann Cvetkovich and Michael Renov serve as external committee members, given the major influence of their scholarship on this project.

At Syracuse University, Steve Cohan continues to be an invaluable colleague and a wonderful mentor through his cogent feedback, intellectual comradeship, and savvy professional advice. I also received very constructive commentary on several parts of this book from a faculty writing group facilitated by my generous colleague Susan Edmunds. The other members of the group whom I thank include Monika Siebert, Mike Goode, Amy Schragger Lang, Claudia Klaver, Linda Shires, Bob Gates, Gail Hamner, Jolynn Parker, and Sarah Brouillette. My ideas about queer AIDS media have additionally benefited from the students in several courses I have taught at Syracuse University, particularly my undergraduate course, “The Media of Witnessing.” Since coming to Syracuse, I have been very fortunate to have met several people—namely, Margaret Himley, Andrew London, and Kendall Phillips—who have proven that intellectual collaborators can quickly become wonderful friends.

Amy Shore, Petra Hammerl-Mistry, Jonathan Kahana, and Frances Guerin all very generously committed considerable time and effort to closely read and comment on various chapter drafts across the years. I am particularly indebted to Frances, with whom I have enjoyed a stimulating intellectual conversation about witnessing and visual culture as we have collaborated as coeditors on The Image and the Witness (2007), a book I consider a companion to the present project. Other friends and colleagues in film studies who must be thanked are Patricia Zimmerman, Patricia White, Lynne Joyrich, José Muñoz, Jeff Smith, Alisa Lebow, Bliss Cua Lim, Keith Harris, Denise McKenna, and Ken Rogers. Elsewhere, in the world of AIDS activism, I learned a great deal from Chris Bartlett. One of the great pleasures of working on independent media is the willingness of media makers to discuss their practice with scholars like me. I am thus grateful to the following media makers and activists for our conversations about their work: Gregg Bordowitz, Jim Hubbard, Sarah Schulman, Alex Juhasz, Matthias Müller, John Greyson, Jack Lewis, Robert Semper, Robert Hilferty, and Shanti Avirgan. Numerous other people have helped secure vital research materials, including James Wentzy, Mike Hoolboom, Matt Wolf, Charles Lum, William Yang, Michael Wallin, Ellen Schneider, Basil Tsiokos, Robin Vachal, Dean Otto, Marnie Fleming, Scott Burnham, and Denah Johnston.

The completion of this project has been financially supported by the College of Arts and Sciences at Syracuse University, which provided a semester leave during the revision process, and by the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences at New York University, which provided a Dean’s Dissertation Fellowship at an earlier stage in the project’s development.

At Duke, I am enormously grateful to Ken Wissoker for his faith in this project. He has sustained its development with his astute judgment and patient generosity. Courtney Berger and Neal McTighe have been wonderful guides in steering me through the production process. Amy Villarejo and Alex Juhasz, the two readers for the press, provided meticulous and highly perceptive commentaries, which have substantially helped me improve the organization and argument of the book.

The long journey that was the writing of this book could not have been completed without the personal encouragement of family and friends, including Ingrid Hallas, Jenny Ward, Mary and Jay Brightman, Lizzie Horn, Shawn Shimpach, Jessica Scarlata, and Nitin Govil. Moreover, I would not have been able to begin my academic career in the United States if it were not for the financial and personal support of my parents, Tony and Brigitte Hallas. It was my mother who first opened my eyes to how cinema could bear witness to historical trauma when we watched together Claude Lanzmann's Shoah over several nights on British television in the late 1980s. Her ethical response to the film engendered a powerful process of coming to terms with the legacy of her childhood in Nazi Germany. She always retained a deep ethical commitment to others throughout her life, a commitment that continues to inspire me in the years since her death. One of my great regrets is that she is not able to witness the publication of this book.

My deepest gratitude must go to Matthew Fee, for all his love, wisdom, and care. We have been together for as many years as it has taken me to complete this project, so he must be credited as its most ardent advocate, especially at those moments at which I have myself felt doubt about it. He has patiently and with infinite grace listened to my fears and frustrations, nurtured my love of cinema with his brilliant analytical eye, and quietly revealed his own profound sagacity to me. Thank you, my cinematic soul mate.
