ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I have been working on this book for a long time and thinking about it even longer. My debts to others are far too large for a full and accurate acknowledgment, but I must at least try. My colleagues and students over the years at the University of Missouri have been a continuing source of information and advice. They have also been patient listeners. I wish to thank my former student, Don Cox, now of the University of Tennessee, whose request for a paper resulted in the germ of the book. I owe similar thanks to Philip Sicker of Fordham University and Eugene Hollahan of Georgia State University for offering me opportunities to develop my ideas about Hopkins in the context of Victorian sentimentality. I am most grateful to G. B. Tennyson of UCLA and Joseph Sendry of Catholic University in Washington, D.C., for their kind assistance in the early stages of this project. My special thanks go to my colleague and friend of over thirty years, Richard Hocks, for his steady encouragement and quick understanding of the social and intellectual issues involved in this study.

I am also grateful to the Research Council of the University of Missouri-Columbia for providing me with two semester research leaves during which I was able to do both the necessary preliminary study for the book and to begin the writing.

Finally, this book could not have been written without the intellectual stimulation and friendship of Owen Barfield, who, over a long lifetime, has made Blake’s proverb a reality for all who have known him: “Opposition is true Friendship.”
