Acknowledgments

Over the years I was preparing this manuscript, I received assistance and support from numerous individuals and organizations whom I wish to thank. I am grateful for all the help and guidance I received from faculty and fellow students at Columbia University, especially Philip Yampolsky, Ryuichi Abé, Paul Watt, Henry Smith, and Sarah Thal. The initial research for my dissertation was generously funded by a grant from the Japan Foundation, and the first write-up was funded by a grant from the Weatherhead Foundation. During my initial period of research in Kyoto, I received hours of assistance from members of the staff at the International Research Institute for Zen Buddhism at Hanazono University and other faculty and staff at Hanazono, including Yanagida Seizan, Urs App, Nishio Kenryū, Maeda Naomi, and Murakami Takashi. At Mampuku-ji, Otsuki Mikio, Tanaka Chisei, and other scholar-monks from the monastery library were generous in providing me access to the collection and their insights into the practice of Obaku Zen.

The second phase of the research and the preparation of the present manuscript were made possible by a research grant from the Center for Japanese Studies at the University of Hawai‘i at Mānoa. I am also grateful to my colleagues and graduate assistants in the Department of Religion at the University of Hawai‘i, who supported the process. In particular I must mention George Tanabe, who read and commented on an early version of the manuscript. Patricia Crosby at the University of Hawai‘i Press guided me through the review process. Without her encouragement and support, this project would never have been completed.

Finally, I wish to thank my family, especially my husband, Rod Low, who support my work and make the effort worthwhile.
