Acknowledgments

Lots of folks deserve lots of credit for helping to midwife this book from its early days of conception and along the winding and torturous road to its actually being published, republished, and then re-re-published once again. Foremost among them is my long-suffering lady love, Sachi Braden. Sachi and I are typical of many of the couples described in this book. We were both previously married, then divorced; we jointly reared her son/my stepson, and we lived together for several years before we both got over our own phobias about remarriage. Sachi finally became my beloved bride about midway through the process of finalizing the first edition of this book. She has allowed as how I was something less than a joy to live with during the months—and ultimately years—that I wound up working on this manuscript.

A lot of appreciation is also due my hard-working staff at both the old Law Offices of Bradley A. Coates and its successor firm, Coates & Frey. These folks kept the doors of the law office open and the cases moving through while the boss spent many afternoons in seclusion “composing.” Foremost among these are the nine associate attorneys who work in the Coates & Frey law firm that I founded and who have been with me for many moons: Paul Soenksen, Robert Young, Ann Isobe, Tom Tanimoto, Noah Gibson, Scott LaFountaine, D. A. Weick, Jo-Ann Takara, and John Hughes. I now serve as “Of Counsel” to the Law Offices of Coates & Frey, and I am the first to admit that many of the young attorneys on my staff are far brighter in any number of areas than am I as the “old dog” who started our firm. In addition, I don’t think there is a single member of my firm’s clerical or administrative staff who didn’t wind up putting in innumerable hours in various stages of typing, proofing, editing, or “polishing” this manuscript.

My special thanks go to my unwaveringly supportive alter ego in the Coates & Frey law firm, my close personal friend and successor as managing attorney, Greg Frey; to our incredibly efficient law office manager, Jamie Komatsu, and our assistant office manager, Geri Palacol; and finally to my administrative assistants James Logue and Spencer Fong, who did much of the manuscript preparation while simultaneously keeping both my personal and professional lives intact.

A huge note of appreciation goes to my former associate Tom Farrell. Tom put in an insane number of thankless and uncompensated hours helping to edit my original manuscript in order to submit it to the University of Hawai’i Press.

Numerous other professional colleagues have assisted, guided, and influenced my surprisingly successful career in family law. Foremost among these are Michael Town, former chief judge of Honolulu’s family court, and Mark Browning, its current chief judge. Judge Town especially has been one of my true personal mentors in the family law field, and it was he who showed me that a sensitive approach to divorce lawyering could be excellent “cross-training” for real life. Mahalo all!
