Acknowledgments

This book, like most, owes a great deal to many others who have contributed their resources, knowledge, and talents to it. Fieldwork in Bali from June 1996 to May 1999 was conducted under the auspices of the Lembaga Ilmu Pengetahuan Indonesia (LIPI) and funded by a large grant from the Australian Research Grants Council. The school of Humanities, La Trobe University, provided funding for translation of texts in 2001, 2002, and 2003. Funds for photographing the artworks were provided by the Department of Sociology/Anthropology, La Trobe University. My thanks to all these bodies for their generous assistance and sponsorship. Color plates 1–24 are based on photographs by the La Trobe University Photography and Digital Imaging Unit. My thanks to the photographer, Andrew Stanish, for his superb work.

The idea for this book originated with an exhibition of paintings by I Ketut Budiana and I Gusti Nyoman Mirdiana, titled “Desire, Divine and Demonic,” held at Kazari Gallery, Melbourne, Australia, in November 2000. It was during preparations for this exhibition, and through my discussions with the gallery owners, Jo Maindonald and Robert Joyce, as well as the responses of those viewing the exhibition, that I was encouraged to shape my ideas about Balinese art and religion into a book. Since its inception, Kazari Gallery has played a pioneering role in inspiring and educating the Australian public concerning the diverse artistic traditions of Asia. A special acknowledgment is due Jo and Robert for including in their aesthetic vision the arts of Bali.

To Gilbert Herdt, whose intellectual and personal friendship over many years has been such an important influence, and with whom I share a deep love of Asian art, my thanks for reading an early draft of this book and encouraging me to develop it to completion. I am indebted to Hildred Geertz for her generous response to my earliest efforts to investigate Balinese culture and for challenging my assumptions about the nature of Balinese knowledge. Her work, especially as it has stressed transformations against hierarchical order in Balinese cosmological notions, has strongly influenced the approach I develop here. I am indebted to my colleague in Asian studies at La Trobe, Greg Bailey, for introducing me to key texts relating to Indian Hinduism and for many stimulating discussions of Indian parallels with Balinese thought. Leo Howe’s detailed and most insightful reader’s report has contributed importantly to the final shaping of the book for publication, especially in helping me to frame my arguments. I also thank an anonymous reader for a philological critique that not only saved me from several factual errors but drew my attention to relevant material I had overlooked.

For introducing me to I Ketut Budiana and for many conversations on all things Balinese, a special thanks to Michelle Chin. My thanks to Rhonda Noble, who curated an exhibition, “The Riches of Balinese Art,” held in 1999 at the La Trobe University Gallery, featuring paintings by I Gusti Nyoman Mirdiana and Dewa Nyoman Batuan. Seven of Mirdiana’s paintings were acquired for the university’s permanent collection at the request of the vice-chancellor, Michael Osborne. The interest shown in this exhibition was another significant influence on the direction my research was to take.

In Bali, my friend and colleague Luh Ketut Suryani and her family have helped me in a great many ways, generously welcoming me into their home, lives, and culture. In 1996 Suryani and I began joint research on an ethnopsychiatric study of Balinese dreams. As part of the project, I wanted to explore the role of dreams in art, but my interest in art and mysticism took on its own dynamic and went off in an unintended direction. Now that I have followed this quest to an end (of sorts), I am freed to return to the original topic and our joint project.

Among the many Balinese to whom Suryani introduced me, the most important for this present work was the late Ida Bagus Sutarja, a Brahmana scholar and mask maker from the village of Mas. Sutarja, in our ongoing discussions over more than three years, revealed to me a view of Balinese religion and mysticism that challenged most of what I had read in the anthropological literature. His erudition—and the impression left by the extraordinary masks he created—sparked my enthusiasm to follow as far as I possibly could the new vistas he opened up to me. To Dewa Nyoman Batuan and his extended family, in whose midst I lived for three years, I am indebted for their kindness, their hospitality, and all they have taught me about Balinese life. I thank Mangku I Gusti Made Barat, Mangku I Made Gina, and the people of Pengosekan village for their many kindesses and for allowing me to participate in their community and family rituals. To Agung Rai, founder of ARMA Museum, my thanks for numerous discussions about Balinese art. I also wish to thank the staff at the Gedong Kirtya lontar library for their assiduous efforts in locating and copying manuscripts for me.
A special acknowledgment is due I Nyoman Suarka of Udayana University, Bali. His translations of texts from Kawi to Indonesian, his explanations of these texts, and his informative answers to my many questions about Balinese religion and mysticism have been a major contribution to my research in Bali and to this book. My interpretations of this material are of course my own, but without Pak Suarka’s assistance in translating a large body of texts relevant to my interests, I would not have been able to develop the arguments presented here.

I Ketut Budiana and I Gusti Nyoman Mirdiana, the two artists whose works form the heart of this book, have made such an enormous contribution that I hardly know how to thank them. Through our several years of friendship and work together, I have come to feel that Budiana and Mirdiana are not merely contributors but rather partners in a project brought to fruition in this book. Mirdiana joins me in making a special tribute and farewell to the magic white dog, Timpal—our loved companion and friend in Bali whose life spanned almost exactly the eight years of work on which this book is based.

For careful guidance and expert editorial assistance in the final shaping of the manuscript for publication, I wish to thank Pamela Kelley, Don Yoder, and the production team at University of Hawai‘i Press.

To my husband, John, who has made an immeasurable contribution to this book—indeed to everything I undertake—my gratitude and love. His courage, strength, and generosity of spirit in the face of extreme adversity never cease to inspire me.

Finally, I wish to thank the many Balinese too numerous to name—priests, scholars, healers, artists, performers, educated elite, ordinary men and women—who graciously and generously shared their knowledge and experience with me. I hope this book will serve in some small way as a return for all I have received from them.
