Acknowledgments

It was a meandering path that led me to write this book, and I have incurred countless debts along the way.

My first foray into serious research began in the graduate program at the University of California, Berkeley. Peter Zinoman guided me with his savvy advice and critical feedback. Penny Edwards and Kerwin Klein nudged me along with their patient encouragement. The late Jeffrey Hadler deepened my understanding of Southeast Asia, and Nguyễn Nguyệt Càm introduced me to Vietnamese literature on the Vietnam War. I also benefited from the mentorship of Christine Trost, Deborah Lustig, and David Minkus during my year as a graduate fellow at the Institute for the Study of Societal Issues.

The warm friendship and intellectual camaraderie of Chi Ha and Siti Keo sustained me throughout my sojourn in Berkeley. Many other friends and colleagues in the United States and Asia also stimulated my development as a historian and reminded me that there was life outside of research, among them Claudine Ang, Michitake Aso, Trang Cao, Wen-Chin Chang, Jessica Chapman, Haydon Cherry, Rebekah Collins, Va Cun, Sean Fear, Cheong Soon Gan, Caroline Herbelin, Tuan Hoang, Alec Holcombe, Kevin Li, Ian Loman, Trinh Luu, Van Ly, Kelley and Allen McCarthy, Shawn McHale, Hoang Ngo, Marguerite Nguyen, Martina Nguyen, Phi Van Nguyen, Van Nguyen-Marshall, John Duong Phan, Jason Picard, Joe Pittayaporn, Brett Reilly, Arjun Subrahmanyan, Meghan Simpson, Ivan Small, Maria Stalford, Geoffrey Stewart, Allen Tran, Rick Tran, Chuong Dai Vo, Eileen Vo, and Vũ Dương Luân.

I began research on this book while on tenure track and had limited time to collect sources. Fortunately, several colleagues generously shared their materials with me. Chi Ha gave me a trove of documents about the Ministry of Information and the press in the Republic of Vietnam. She and Jason Picard provided numerous articles from historical newspapers. Kevin Li and Brett Reilly passed along French and Vietnamese archival documents, and Brett gave me a copy of Hồ Hữu Tường’s memoir. François Guillemot sent me copies of archival sources from France. Additionally, Sean Fear, Siti Keo, Kevin, Shawn McHale, Ryan Nelson, Martina Nguyen, Phi Van Nguyen, Jason, Brett, and Peter Zinoman let me read their unpublished research. I also thank François Guillemot, Janet Hoskins, Kevin, Phi Van, and Jason for answering my questions about various religious and political groups.

Historical research would be impossible without libraries and archives, and I express deep gratitude to the librarians and archivists who facilitated my work: David Langbart at the National Archives and Records Administration; the friendly staff of the Cornell University Library; Nguyễn Thị Như Trang, Tô Thị Chi Trưng, Bùi Thị Bích Thúy, Bùi Thị Hảo, Lâm Thị Ngọc Thư, and Nguyễn Thị Lê Ninh at the General Sciences Library, Vietnam; and Cù Thị Dung, Đặng Thị Văn, Nguyễn Thị Luyến, and Trần Thị Thúy Linh at the National Archives Center II, also in Vietnam. Đặng Thị Cẩm Tú and Đỗ Kiên facilitated my research access in Vietnam, and several research assistants helped me collect and catalog materials, including Sarah Hodge, Marika Lohmus, Frances Martin, Ngô Hạnh, Nguyễn Ngân, Marc Reyes, Megan Streit, Võ Anh Tuấn, Hoàng Vũ, Yang Zheng, and Max Zimmerman.

Funding for my research came from the Fulbright-Hays, Mellon-CLIR, and University of Connecticut. I revised the manuscript while on a fellowship at the University of Connecticut Humanities Institute, and the Felberbaum Family Fac-culty Fund and other funds from the university covered the miscellaneous costs of manuscript preparation.

I have often felt lost during this journey and am thankful for the mentors who helped me find my bearings again and again. Edward Miller has mentored me informally since I was a graduate student. He answered endless questions about archival research, sent relevant primary sources my way, and shared his knowldge of American foreign relations and Ngô Đình Diệm’s rule. Lien-Hang Thi Nguyen expressed interest in the book before I had even written a word and later encouraged me to submit the manuscript to the Weatherhead series. Tuong Vu heroically read a raw, unfinished draft and was unstinting in his encouragement and advice. At the University of Connecticut, Jason Chang, Sylvia Schafer, and Cathy Schlund-Vials showed me the ropes of departmental life and provided many suggestions on the manuscript.

The careful work and kindness of many individuals helped turn the manuscript into a book. Masako Ikeda at the University of Hawai‘i Press helped me throughout the publication process, and two anonymous reviewers offered invaluable feedback. Grace Wen oversaw the production of the book, Helen Glenn Court copyedited the manuscript, and Vicki Low prepared the index. Hồ Thị Bảo Tiên and Jacob Raterman proofread Vietnamese- and French-language terms, respectively. Erin Greb prepared a superb set of maps, and Phan Quang Tuệ, Trần Văn Tòng, and the Cornell University Library generously provided images of historical figures.

I was only a teenager when I first peered down the long road of graduate training, and I thank my high school history teacher Chris McQueen for taking me aside and suggesting I consider an academic career. It was a brief conversation that changed the course of my life. At Seattle University, Theresa Earenfight, Hazel Hahn, and William Kangas introduced me to the joys of research and advised me on my applications to graduate school. Outside the classroom, the support of my dear friends Kevin Grove, Rebecca Khalil, Jasmine Marwaha, Meg Matthews, Evan Pham, and Aaron Van Dyke strengthened my resolve to pursue graduate studies. The warmth of the Sanoner family made me feel at home during my first stint studying abroad and assured me that I had what it took to live overseas.

Although doing so is somewhat unconventional, I would like to mention people and institutions that rarely receive formal recognition in the acknowledgments of academic books. I came to the United States as a refugee, and I am grateful to the social workers, volunteers, charities, social service organizations, and government agencies that eased my family’s resettlement in the United States. I feel similar gratitude toward the teachers and librarians who contributed to my education from Head Start through high school. As an adult, I often employed domestic workers to clean my home during my residence abroad and, more recently, in the United States. I am all too aware that their physical labor made my intellectual labor possible.

Ultimately, my journey can be traced back to my family and relatives, and it is to them that I owe my greatest debt. I thank my husband Peter Lavelle for his unwavering love and support. He shared my excitement when I made new discoveries, comforted me when I faced setbacks, and suggested revisions when I struggled with my writing. I could not ask for a better partner in life or in research. I am grateful to my brother and his family and my husband’s family for offering much needed refuge away from academic work. In Vietnam, my cousin was my confidant and best friend, always ready with friendly advice or a funny story. Most of all, I thank my parents for teaching me Vietnamese and supporting my decision to become a historian. They came of age in Saigon in the 1960s and 1970s and their tales of the life they left behind piqued my research interest in the Republic of Vietnam.

My mother deserves special recognition as my first teacher of Vietnamese history. Throughout my childhood, she taught Vietnamese-language classes on top of her full time job and, despite having no pedagogical training, designed her own curriculum on the literature, history, and geography of Vietnam. After I began graduate school, she assiduously collected overseas Vietnamese memoirs and history books to aid me in my research. Although my mother did not live to see the completion of this book, it is in so many ways a testament to her hard work. I dedicate this book in her memory.
