Acknowledgements

This book emerged from a session at the EASA conference in Ljubljana, August 2008. We want to thank our authors and other participants at the session for making this rare confluence of interests possible. It has resulted in an unusually focused edited collection, as noted by the reviewers for Berghahn Books, which does not only genuinely address the issues it claims to focus on in each and every chapter, but also displays a remarkable coherence of approach summarized by the notion of ‘critical junctions’. As such it advances our project in ways that none of us alone could have done, and it does generate cumulative insight to a degree that is unfortunately rather rare in anthropology, dominated as it is by individual artisanry. Parts of the introduction and case studies were discussed during presentations at the Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology, Central European University; a Max Weber conference at the European University Institute, Florence; at a OSI/HESP meeting in Odessa; at the Fernand Braudel Centre, SUNY-Binghamton; and the Anthropology Colloquium at CUNY Graduate Centre. We are grateful for the invitations and the responses. In addition to our contributors, we want to thank Gus Carbonella, Marc Edelman, Jean-Louis Fabiani, Jonathan Friedman, Lesley Gill, Ornulf Gulbrandsen, Bruce Kapferer, Susana Narotzky, Mathijs Pelkmans, Jakob Rigi, Oscar Salemink, Sharyn Kasmir, Gavin Smith, and Luisa Steur, for insights, comments and discussion. In addition, Gabor Halmai wants to emphasize his gratefulness for the encouragements and inputs received from participants in the wider intellectual community of the SocAnth department at CEU. Insiders may recognize that the book betrays recurrent discussions with Gavin Smith and with (the work of) Jonathan Friedman: without these two magisterial anthropologists and their engaging and contrarian scholarship this would have been a different and certainly less perceptive book. The remaining errors and weaknesses are of course ours. James Carrier, the Editor of this Series, kept a firm hand and offered excellent feed-back when we needed it. We finally want to acknowledge that our work with students at CEU and elsewhere has decisively contributed to the insights and positions developed here. We therefore dedicate the book to our former, current, and future students, both of the nearby and the distant variety. Our work depends on you.
