ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Studies of religious behaviors and beliefs are often, in one way or another, studies of hope—a commodity which has been in surprisingly good supply in the recent past in Louisiana, where this project was conceived. The editors would therefore first like to acknowledge Mother Nature for generously providing the adversity—including a tree which crashed through one of their living rooms during Hurricane Gustav in 2008—that challenged us to persist, as did so many other Louisianans in these times, and to see our project through. In a similar vein, several funding agencies, here to remain anonymous, contributed by denying our grant applications for a conference which was to provide the original basis for this volume. The application process itself was constructive, however, in that it drove us to identify and contact a distinguished group of some 25 scholars who saw the value of our comparative study and agreed in advance to come to Baton Rouge. Out of this group, a core of contributors emerged who were willing to continue, by their own means if necessary. We owe to them our profound thanks.

Since several members of this core taught at Georgetown University, we agreed to convene there voluntarily for a workshop in 2008 in order to share and exchange comments on our draft papers. This was immensely helpful in contributing to whatever coherence the volume as a whole possesses. We would especially like to acknowledge the generosity of the Theology Department at Georgetown, including Joseph Murphy and Anh Q. Tran, for hosting this meeting and making our stay there a comfortable and rewarding one. Professor Peter C. Phan was also especially supportive, even though he could not attend.

Others who contributed to our efforts include various colleagues at each home institution and the anonymous reviewers for Berghahn Books, not to mention their editorial staff, whose professionalism and patience we also appreciated. The artist in residence at Louisiana State University’s unique Department of Geography and Anthropology, Mary Lee Eggart, is responsible for much of the book’s visual appeal.

The project was initially conceived by David Lindenfeld, a historian. Miles Richardson, an anthropologist, was brought in at an early stage. of the application process. He wishes to express his gratitude for the opportunity to participate.

Baton Rouge, Louisiana
June 2010