The research for this book started with the award of an Early Career Fellowship by the Leverhulme Trust (ECF-2015-391). That Fellowship began in 2015 at the University of Edinburgh before I moved to the University of St Andrews a year later. Both institutions offered a supportive research environment; in addition, the School of History at St Andrews provided funding and leave that enabled the completion of this book. My understanding of post-war Scottish politics has benefited from talking to – and reading the work of – numerous scholars, who I won’t list in full here. Nevertheless, I am particularly grateful to Ewen Cameron and Colin Kidd, who have been a welcome source of support and advice throughout the duration this project. Further, the participants at the seminars in modern Scottish and British history at the universities of Cambridge, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Oxford, and St Andrews offered valuable feedback on aspects of the subsequent analysis. Any errors that remain in this study are, naturally, my own.

Discussions with the students I am fortunate enough to teach at St Andrews played an important role in helping me clarify the arguments that follow. Special thanks are due to the final-year undergraduates who made teaching a module about radical politics in twentieth-century Scotland such an enjoyable experience despite the challenges posed by a global pandemic. Similar debts are owed to Sarah Leith, Daniel Leaver, and Amber Ward, whose doctoral projects I have had the privilege of supervising, and who have taught me so much about twentieth-century Scotland.

This project was aided by the archivists and librarians at the National Library of Scotland, the Conservative Party Archive at the Bodleian Library, the Labour History Archive and Study Centre at the People’s History Museum in Manchester, Glasgow’s Mitchell Library, the university libraries in Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh, St Andrews and Stirling, and the public libraries and archives in Aberdeen, Dundee, Falkirk, and Perth. The Conservative Party kindly granted permission to consult material at both the National Library of Scotland and the Bodleian Library. I would also like to acknowledge the patience and understanding of the editorial team at Edinburgh University Press.

My son, Arthur, was born during the early stages of the research for this study: if this book has taken longer to complete than I had initially planned, it is because he and I had more important things to do. In any case, this book – or, as he would describe it, my ‘boring computer work’ – is for him, and for my wife, Fiona, without whose support and love nothing would have been possible.
