Acknowledgements

This book enjoyed a gestation period that some might deem to be shamefully extended, beginning as a diversionary interest in lesbian pulp fiction and a quite serious concern with the directions and possible futures of queer theory, and becoming, ultimately, a gradually coalescing desire to bring together questions of gender, shame and writing in ways that might have some political utility in the world beyond the text.

During its writing, I benefited enormously from two crucial sabbaticals: in 2011, as a Visiting Scholar at New York University’s Center for the Study of Gender and Sexuality; and from January 2014 to August 2015 as a Humboldt Fellow in Berlin. Many thanks to Carolyn Dinshaw, Ann Pellegrini and Robert D. Campbell for making that NYU stay possible, and for inviting me back to present my work in progress in 2012; thanks also to Heather Love for being a really magnanimous and insightful respondent in 2012; the book first took shape during my time at NYU. Special thanks, too, to the Lesbian Herstory Archives in New York, where I spent many happy weeks pillaging their pulp collection, and to the fantastic archivist there, Desiree Yael Vester; thanks also to the staff of the Sallie Bingham Center for Women’s History and Culture at Duke University, where I was able to read some out-of-print and otherwise hard to find 1950s pulp material.

The biggest thanks, though, must go to the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation, whose provision of an Experienced Researcher Fellowship allowed me to spend a luxurious amount of time concentrating solely on research, as a fellow in the Institut für Anglistik und Amerikanistik at Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin. I was fortunate enough to have a wonderful host there – Eveline Kilian – whose welcome and encouragement made me feel instantly at home; long may the connection and collaborations continue. Thanks also to
Acknowledgements

I am hugely grateful for the gift of that time for dedicated research and reflection. Excerpts from and earlier versions of the material here – as well as corollary musings on shame and gender – have also been published in several collections or journals; thanks in particular to the editors of those publications for their feedback – Heike Bauer and Matt Cook, David Glover and Scott McCracken, Jodie Medd, Rebecca Pohl and Christopher Vardy, Katrin Röder and Christine Vogt-William, Suzanne Keen and Emma Parker, Barry Sheils and Julie Walsh.

I was immensely fortunate to work with Jackie Jones and Ersev Ersoy at Edinburgh University Press on British Avant-Garde Fiction of the 1960s (2019), so it is a real pleasure to be able to publish this book with EUP too. Thank you to them, and to the anonymous readers whose diligent, generous feedback helped me tune and tweak the manuscript of Writing Shame in the final stages. Thanks to Wendy Lee for her eagle-eyed copy-editing.

My colleagues at the University of Manchester have, as ever, been incredibly supportive, collegial, forgiving and stimulating; I feel very lucky to have stumbled into such a great department. Thanks, in particular, to David Alderson, Anke Bernau, Daniela Caselli, Emma Clarke, Laura Doan, Honor Gavin, Jerome de Groot, John McAuliffe, Monica Pearl, Alan Rawes, Jackie Stacey, Chris Vardy and Jeanette Winterson.

Looking beyond Manchester, I am grateful to Laura Salisbury for friendship and inspiration over many years, despite the distance; I owe extra-special thanks to Katherine Angel and Jennifer Cooke, for brilliant conversations and formative thinking about sex, shame and life-writing, and for invaluable feedback on Chapter 3; and I am immensely grateful to Maria Alexopoulos, who provided the generous, careful, kind feedback on the Introduction and Conclusion that helped nudge me over the finishing line. Thanks to Paul Fullbrook for the striking cover image. Thanks too to Pete Bennett for oining, nipping, word-of-the-day and other lovely distractions from writing.

I would like to dedicate this book, though, to the expanding constellation of Berlin friends, the people who have contrived to make that city such a joyful and transformative place for me, and who always have something to say about shame: Maria Alexopoulos (whose friendship is so important I have to thank her twice, for dinners on the balcony as well as editorial suggestions); Julia Bell (for a conversation begun one night in Neukölln, which I hope will continue indefinitely); Amélie Bonet (for bike rides and lake-swimming); Orlando Lovell (for book-browsing companionship and perfect postcards); Judith Schmitt (for the most welcoming Stammtisch); Philip Venables (for inspiration across art forms); and, above all, Mark Chadwick and Graeme Vaughan for love, late nights, sarcasm and the best holidays.

And finally: thanks and love to Mitch and Fiona Mitchell for never being too ashamed of me, no matter what I say or do.