Acknowledgements

This book has benefited from the support of a great number of people and institutions, for which I feel extremely lucky and grateful and without which the completion of the project that led to the writing of this book would not have been possible. I would like to acknowledge in the first place the Mobilitas award, a fellowship granted by the Estonian Research Agency (Eesti Teadusagentuur) for the postdoctoral project ‘The role and perception of English as a global language in academic research and higher education’ (Mobilitas grant number GFLEE322MJ), a project hosted by the Department of Estonian and General Linguistics of the University of Tartu. Martin Ehala acted graciously as my host at the department, giving me the space and freedom to conduct the project, and providing scholarly guidance when needed, for which I am indebted. From a more practical and administrative point of view, Tiia Margus and Leelo Padari made sure that I had always what I needed on the day-to-day running of the project, as did Anne Tenno, my contact point regarding grant-related matters at the university. To all of them, a big thank you.

At the University of Tartu, additional key support came from other colleagues and friends of mine, including especially from Djuddah Leijen, Head of the Centre for Academic Writing and Communication at the university (AVOK, in its Estonian acronym), and Virve-Anneli Vihman, whose insider knowledge about recent developments in connection to the internationalization policies at the university proved extremely useful and helpful in my research project. A very special and heartfelt thank you to both of them. During the time when the project was being implemented, I was lucky enough to be able to travel with my ideas and preliminary findings to a good number of conferences and symposia. In them, I was able to engage in meaningful discussions and debates with colleagues who were working on related issues and who, as a result, ended up having an impact on my thinking about my own project. At the risk of missing many, I would like to thank the following colleagues: Beyza Björkman, David Block, Lídia Gallego-Balsà, Anna Kristina Hultgren, Merike Jürna, Kerttu Kibbermann, Kadri Koreinik, Maria Kuteeva, Heiko Marten, Taina Saarinen, and once again Virve-Anneli Vihman. With many of them, our discussions about shared interests led to further, more intense collaborations, ending in many cases in co-authored publications. Indeed, two of the chapters of this monograph draw directly on two such co-authored publications. Chapter 2 is derived in part from an article co-authored with Taina Saarinen and Kerttu Kibbermann, published in the Journal of Multilingual and Multicultural Development, 38(4), 301–314, copyright Taylor & Francis, and Chapter 3 is derived in part from an article co-authored with Virve-Anneli Vihman, published in Current Issues in Language Planning, 19(1), 22–41, copyright Taylor &
Francis. Permission to reuse the articles from the publisher and my co-authors is deeply appreciated. I am grateful to the Association for the Advancement of Baltic Studies (AABS) for the Emerging Scholar Grant award (2013) to conduct a study on the linguistic landscape of Baltic universities; Chapter 2 draws in part on data collected during that project.

In the final stages of my project, I was actively involved in the COST-funded network on New Speakers (Action IS-1306, www.nspk.org.uk). That involvement was particularly significant for my thinking and further reading about language policy issues. I would like to thank Bernadette O’Rourke and Joan Pujolar, the respective Chair and Vice-Chair of the Action, for giving me the opportunity to become a more active member of the network, and especially to Jeroen Darquennes, who co-led with me the working group of the network on ‘new speakers and language policy’. In addition, also in connection with the last stages of my research, the writing of the book was completed when I had already joined the Department of English at Stockholm University. Conversations and discussions held with colleagues at the department have inevitably shaped the direction of my thinking about my object of study. I wish to thank, in that respect, Beyza Björkman, Kathrin Kaufhold, and Maria Kuteeva, for much collegial support. At De Gruyter Mouton, I would like to thank Lara Wysong for her continued assistance in the management of the project, and to Crispin Thurlow and David Britain, series editors of Language and Social Life, for their encouragement and support, especially in the early stages of the writing of this monograph. Finally, I would like this book to humbly pay homage to the memory of Professor Volli Kalm (1953–2017), the late rector of the University of Tartu, who passed away suddenly as the writing of this monograph was being finalized. As will become apparent, Professor Kalm was an invested interlocutor in the public discussion on the internationalization of Estonian higher education, and I can only hope the present monograph does some justice to his contributions to the debate.

Needless to say, it is impossible to complete any ethnographic project by oneself, and this project was no exception. I would like to thank all my informants and research participants who took time out of their busy schedules in order to sit down with me and talk about language-related issues at the university, or who allowed me to sit down with them in their academic English classes and record what was happening during class. Without them, the project and this book would simply have been impossible.

Last but not least, there is the emotional and personal support. This book is dedicated to Anthee, my partner in life and my endless source of inspiration. The fact that the book has actually been driven to an end, closely observing the foreseen schedule, is not a coincidence: Anthee and her coaching me and pushing me to focus on the writing project were essential in the latter stages of it. A big, big thank you to you, Anthee.
