Acknowledgments

For a book that insists on the correspondence between vengeance and civility, it is perhaps odd to take such delight in acknowledging the many whose intellects and beings have sustained me. But contradictions are, of course, the stuff of life. Glimmers of this book first emerged when I had the pleasure of working closely with Lee Edelman and Judith Haber at Tufts University. I thank them for their many lessons—several of which I have only learned belatedly yet appreciate all the more. Anyone familiar with their scholarship knows they are two astonishingly careful readers, and it’s my hope that their collective influence remains visible on the following pages and all future ones. Kevin Dunn—a model of empathy and wit—improves everything around him, and I’m always delighted when our paths cross. I thank my peers at Tufts as well as Noah Barrientos, Chantal Hardy, Joseph Litvak, Wendy Medeiros, Douglas Riggs, Modhumita Roy, and Christina Sharpe.

The book evolved considerably during the two years I spent at Vanderbilt University as an Andrew W. Mellon Assistant Professor. I regard that period with great fondness and remain most appreciative to the English department faculty and staff for their intellectual support, opportunities for professional development, myriad kindnesses, and continued friendships. At Louisiana State University, I want to recognize the support and companionship of my colleagues, including Chris Barrett, Michael Bibler, Lauren Coats, Rebecca Crump, Bill Demastes, Philip Geheber, Angeletta Gourdine, Joseph Kronick, Isiah Lavender III, Elsie Michie, Rick Moreland, Laura Mullen, LeRoy Percy, Malcolm Richardson, Jean Rohloff, Irina Shport, Sue Weinstein, Jim Wilcox, Katie Will, Sunny Yang, and Michelle Zerba. Our administrative staff—Robin Collor, Nancy Fontenot, Valerie Hudson, Richard Landry, and Ashley Thibodeaux—assists with matters both catastrophic and ordinary. Finally, I wish to thank my ever-enlivening students, past and present; they, too, are a part of this project.

During the 2017–18 academic year, I was a Visiting Scholar at Brown University’s Pembroke Center, and I thank Suzanne Stewart-Steinberg as well as Leela Gandhi, Donna Goodnow, Bonnie Honig, and Drew Walker for making possible this splendid opportunity. Anjuli Gunaratne and Ron Wilson were (and remain) a most unexpected blessing from that year, and I am grateful for their friendship. Thanks to my proximity to Cambridge, I was able to participate in and present at the Shakespearean Seminar, led by the inimitable Bill Carroll and Coppélia Kahn, at Harvard University’s Mahindra Humanities Center.

I have benefited enormously from the opportunity to share this work with audiences at meetings of the Shakespeare Association of America, the International Congress on Medieval Studies at Kalamazoo, the Renaissance Society of America, and the Modern Language Association. In particular, I give thanks for a community of scholars who have supported this project at various stages; they include Joseph Campana, Jay Clayton, Jennifer Clement, Barbara Correll, Elizabeth Covington, Katie Crawford, Holly Crocker, Lynn Enterline, Natalie Eschenbaum, Carla Freccero, Rick Hilles, Bradley Irish, Amanda Kellogg, Donika Kelly, Sarah Kersh, Marcela Kostihova, James Knapp, Nancy Reisman, Mark Schoenfield, Kathryn Schwarz, and Katie Will.

My research has been supported by the generosity of the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation as well as the Louisiana Board of Regents, which gave me an Award to Louisiana Artists & Scholars (ATLAS) grant. At Louisiana State University, the Office of Research and Economic Development has provided me with a Council on Research Fellowship, a Manship Summer Research Fellowship, a Regent Research award, and multiple travel grants—all of which contributed to the development of this book. I thank, too, the College of Humanities and Social Sciences and Dean Stacia Haynie for a fourth-year teaching release. Finally, I thank Assistant Dean Ann Whitmer for her expertise and unflappably good nature regarding all things related to funding.

I am profoundly grateful to my editor at Cornell University Press, Mahinder Kingra, for his original interest in the project and for the care with which he has shepherded the book through each stage of the publication process. My thanks to all the splendid members of my editorial and production team including Bethany Wasik, Susan Specter, Kate Gibson, David Prout, Martyn Beeny, and Carmen Torrado Gonzalez. Marcela Kostihova and the anonymous reader offered astute suggestions for revision, and their incisive feedback has improved the book all the more. Thank you.

In my personal life, which so often suffuses the professional realm, I remain inspired by and grateful for the enduring friendship of Kathryn Schwarz and Katie Crawford. I marvel at their exquisite kindness and intellectual generosity. Being in the presence of Katie Will is a privilege and a pleasure, and I am heartily glad for her excellent company on the bayou. Bill Demastes and Jean Rohloff are invaluable colleagues who have become family over the years—a simple yet extraordinary metamorphosis. As my faculty mentor, Bill helped me navigate the pre-tenure years with his seasoned guidance, characteristic levity, and abiding care. I thank Edward Dornblaser—literary saboteur, fellow correspondent, and kin who is kind—for so very much and indeed much more than I can put words to.

My partner in crime and for life, Diego Millan, is particularly eager to read what I have written about him (such are the residual pathologies of a middle child). Yet it remains a nearly impossible task to summarize how his presence nourishes this project and me. A trusted reader and confidante, he has been actively involved in this book since its inception, and his intelligence has improved every page. Thank you, D, for impressing upon me that the best revenge—civil or otherwise—is the embrace of a happy life, and thank you, dear one, for making that possible.
