Although my name is the only one listed on the cover, the book would not have come into existence were it not for dozens of other unofficial contributors and supporters. Both during and after my two years at Villanova University, Jeffrey Hahn and Maria Toyoda offered invaluable guidance and mentorship as I learned to navigate my way in American academia. At Cornell University, I was incredibly fortunate to have Valerie Bunce as my mentor. Whatever success I have had as an academic researcher, I owe to her guidance. Jonathan Kirshner and Tom Pepinsky offered enormously helpful advice and support throughout the entire dissertation process. In general, Cornell’s Department of Government cultivated a culture that permitted exploration of big questions that crossed rigid disciplinary boundaries, which allowed me to learn from scholars like Peter Katzenstein, Kaushik Basu, Richard Swedberg, Eswar Prasad, and many others. I am thankful to have had a chance to study with them.

I look back on my time at Cornell with special fondness because of the friendships that I made with my colleagues. Then and in the years that followed, Julie Ajinkya, Phil Ayoub, Jaimie Bleck, Ben Brake, Michael Dichio, Berk Esen, Janice Gallagher, Simon Gilhooley, Desmond Jagmohan, Don Leonard, Pinar Kemerli, Deondra Rose, Tariq Thachil, Pablo Yanguas, and Chris Zepeda-Millán—all have played an important role in helping me advance my research. Although I doubt any of them will take an iota of credit, I know that every one of them helped by offering advice, reading early drafts of my manuscript, or simply walking up and down that hill together.

I am particularly indebted to the people I interviewed for this project in Russia. Those exchanges included the most thought-provoking conversations about Russian business and politics I have ever had. Over the years, I presented versions of this work at various venues that are too numerous to list, but in particular, I am indebted to the organizers and participants of the “Globalizing Eurasia” workshop sponsored by the Social Science Research Council and the Davis Center for Russian and Eurasian Studies at Harvard University; workshops organized by Henry Hale and Marlene Laruelle at George Washington University; the Dissertation Workshop in Global Political Economy organized by the Balsillie School of International Affairs; and various workshops and events held at the Harriman Institute at Columbia University during the year of my postdoctoral fellowship. It was a great privilege to work with Katharina Pistor, whose ideas about the legal foundations of financial globalization have profoundly impacted the way I think about these issues. Timothy Frye welcomed me to Harriman and took a genuine interest in my project, which meant a great deal to me then and still does now.

My colleagues in the Political Science Department at Wellesley College played an instrumental role in supporting my decision to abandon most of my doctoral thesis and write a new, more focused manuscript from scratch. In particular, Stacie Goddard was a fantastic mentor who continues to be a role model of scholarly, pedagogical, and human integrity. I am also profoundly grateful for the friends I made at Wellesley who supported my project, including Maneesh Arora, Jenn Chudy, Susan Ellison, Alla Epsteyn, Robert Goree, Tom Hodge, Kathy Moon, Liza Oliver, Ryan Quintana, Joe Swingle, Nina Tumarkin, and Adam Weiner. Two students, Emma Schwartz and Samantha Lai, provided stellar research assistance for several chapters of the book. I am forever indebted to Juliet Johnson, Mitchell Orenstein, David Woodruff, and Alex Cooley for taking part in my book workshop in 2017. Spending that autumn day talking about my work with this group still ranks as the most rewarding intellectual experience of my career. I also have to thank Anna Vassilieva of the Graduate Initiative for Russian Studies at Monterey Institute for International Studies for allowing me to spend a sabbatical in beautiful Monterey, California, where I completed this manuscript. It was a pleasure to work with Cornell University Press editors Roger Haydon, Emily Andrew, and the Cornell Studies in Money series editor Eric Helleiner, who patiently helped me steer the manuscript toward completion through a period of time that included the birth of my daughter, a global pandemic, and a cross-country move. Special thanks is owed to Thomas Mowle, who always went far beyond his call of duty. My new colleagues at Occidental College have been nothing but welcoming and supportive, despite the emergency circumstances of the pandemic. Anthony Chase and Derek Shearer, in particular, made every effort to welcome my family to Los Angeles amid a Covid-induced lockdown.

So many friends outside of academia have supported me when the going got tough, including the whole Walker family (Frank, Ruth Ann, Rusty, and Dennis), Daniel McKenna-Foster, Po Saidi, Andrew Levine, Vicki and Jordan Gantz, and all the members of the “Redlands crew.” It would be impossible to fully express my appreciation for my parents, Elena and Oleg, and my sister Alena for their love and support. I cannot quite explain how but being so far away from you all forced us to learn to be closer in our frequent conversations and text exchanges. I hope to live up to your astonishingly high opinion of me one day. In a very practical sense, the book would not have been written were it not for the unending support of my wife Sayda Zelaya. Thank you for patiently tolerating my escapes to the office on the weekends to revise this or that chapter “just one more time,” especially after the birth of our daughter. I know that nobody will be happier to read this line than you: this book is done!

Finally, I must mention my remarkable late grandmother Zoya Logvinenko. Born to illiterate parents, she made her way through university medical training to become a doctor who served her village community outside of Bishkek (then Frunze) for many decades. As a child, she lived through World War II and the postwar famine, and in her old age she had to experience the full personal and financial impact of the post-Soviet calamity. Despite all this, she was the best, most inspiring grandmother one could ever wish for. Her work ethic, humility, ability to tolerate discomfort, and selflessness astonish me to this day. I know that a little part of her lives on in my daughter. This book is dedicated to the two Zoyas who altered the course of my life: Zoya Georgievna Logvinenko and Zoya Lucia Logvinenko.
