Acknowledgments

Over the past decade and more, far too many persons and institutions directly and indirectly contributed to the writing of Diasporic Cold Warriors to be mentioned by name in these next few paragraphs. I hope I can do some justice to their contributions, nonetheless. At Columbia, Adam McKeown welcomed me into the international and global history program, inducted me into the study of Chinese migration and diaspora, and, in a café on the northwestern corner of Central Park one spring afternoon, blessed my inchoate research topic after having left academia for greener pastures. I wish that he were still here today to read this. Thanks to Eugenia Lean, I am able to identify myself as a historian of modern China, albeit one who comes to the field from the outside in. Her colloquium in the spring of 2013 was the intellectual high point of my years in New York. Despite our vastly different approaches to the “Chinese” past, her comments have always been on the mark. “What would Eugenia think?” is still a question that I ask myself as I try to live up to her intellectual standards.

During graduate school, I was equally fortunate to be surrounded by brilliant friends and colleagues at Columbia and beyond. Collectively and individually, Clark Alejandrino, Kyoungjin Bae, Nishant Batsha, Manuel Bautista, Allison Bernard, Harun Buljina, Chris Chang, John Chen, Eunsung Cho, Kumhee Cho, Richard Chu, Jae-Won Chung, Sam Daly, Evan Dawley, Clay Eaton, Hannah Elmer, Chloe Estep, Idriss Fofana, James Gerien-Chen, Arunabh Ghosh, Yanjie Huang, Xiaqian Ji, Colin Jones, Ulug Kuzuoglu, James Lin, Owen Miller, Sanyantani Mukherjee, Jack Neubauer, Sean O’Neill, Allison Powers, Victor Petrov, Josh Schlachet, Nataly Shahaf, Ian Shin, John Thompson, Tyler Walker, Yijun Wang, Dominic Yang, Adrien Zakar, and Dongxin Zou—among many others—provided generous and thoughtful feedback; inspired me through their own scholarship and intellectual ruminations; helped me decipher sources and conceptualize narratives; kept me sane over beers, happy hours, and Civilization V multiplayer; and introduced me to Game of Thrones. I also want to thank Lien-Hang Nguyen and Michael Szonyi for offering penetrating insights at a... late stage and Matt Connelly and Betsy Blackmar for their suggestions during the initial stages of the project.

Research and writing during graduate school were funded by the Weatherhead East Asian Institute, the Sasakawa Young Leaders’ Fellowship Fund, the China and Inner Asia Council of the Association for Asian Studies, and the Confucius China Studies Program. In the Philippines, Taiwan, and China, respectively, the Institute of Philippine Culture at Ateneo de Manila University, the Institute of Modern History at Academia Sinica, and the Research School for Southeast Asian Studies at Xiamen University were gracious hosts during my overseas stints. I am indebted to the librarians and archivists across Asia and the United States who helped me track down materials and to the many persons, especially in the Philippines, whom I was able to converse with about their life stories and my research. I am particularly grateful to Teresita Ang See, Teresa Chong Carino, Wesley Chua, Go Bon Juan, the late Benito Lim, Charlson Ong, Dory Poa, the late Julio Tan, Tan Tian Siong, and Solomon Yuyitung for sharing their experiences with me.

Having emigrated “overseas,” I completed this book back “home” thanks to Ministry of Education Tier 2 Academic Research Fund (MOE2018-T2-1-138) that enabled me to become part of the “Reconceptualizing the Cold War” (RCW) research project at the National University of Singapore. Over the past few years, I have benefited tremendously from the social and intellectual companionship of Ang Cheng Guan, Chan Cheow-Thia, Henry Chan, Sayaka Chatani, Jack Chia, Clay Eaton, Leow Wei Yi, Jason Lim, Masuda Hajimu, Wen-Qing Ngoei, Joseph Scalice, Seng Guo Quan, Josh Stenberg, Mitchell Tan, Tan Ying Jia, Taomo Zhou, and Dongxin Zou. I am grateful to Hajimu for welcoming me into RCW; Sayaka and Taomo for our many lunches together and discussions on Asian diasporas; my old Columbia friends Clay and Dongxin for always finding the time to read one more draft and listen to one more idea; Joseph, for conversations about the Philippines, the academic job market, and communism; and Wen-Qing, for extended Facebook and WhatsApp chats.

Special thanks must go to Mike Montesano and Carol Hau. Mike has been an intellectual mentor since we met over a decade ago in Singapore and I declared my intention then to pursue a Ph.D. Over e-mail, coffee, and meals, he introduced me to the professional study of Southeast Asia, supported my research, and opened more doors for me than I can count. Very early on, Mike introduced me to Carol. Although we have met in person only once, no one has read more of my work than she has. Without Mike and Carol, I would not have known where to start and how to continue.

Emily Andrew, Allegra Martschenko, and others at Cornell University Press shepherded this book all the way through from proposal to final product.
I could not ask for a more supportive, responsive, and meticulous editorial team. I would like to thank the press’s two peer reviewers and the anonymous reader for the Studies of the Weatherhead East Asian Institute series for their feedback, which helped me refine the manuscript. The excellent maps and index are the work of Mike Bechthold and Malcolm Thompson respectively, while a First Book Subvention Award from the Association for Asian Studies helped cover the costs of publication. A modified version of chapter 3 was published as “In the Name of Anticommunism: Chinese Practices of Ideological Accommodation in the Early Cold War Philippines” in Modern Asian Studies 53, no. 5 (September 2019): 1543–1573. That chapter and others have been enriched by comments and questions at multiple conferences, workshops, and seminars since 2013.

Lastly, I could not have done this without friends, family members, and former students. Since secondary school, Ooi Say Hien has been an inexhaustible source of intelligent conversation on pretty much everything. In the grueling, lonely, but pedagogically rewarding year that I spent at the University of the Pacific, my cousin Itamar Calmon-Huang and Aunt Isabel put me up in their home in the Bay Area and fed me during the holidays. I became interested in modern Southeast Asia during my three and a half years at Raffles Institution in Singapore, where I had the privilege of teaching several amazing cohorts of A-Level students.

I dedicate this book to my parents, who have always afforded me the freedom to pursue my interests and supported me through trying times.
