Aknowledgments

For all their singularity, our lives are outcomes of fortuitous encounters, formative figures, and intimate relationships, and it is in this spirit that I acknowledge my parents, Emily and Darcy Jackson, my maternal grandfather Fred Longbottom, my elder sister Gabrielle Maxwell (nee Jackson), and my early role models Herman Gladwin and Bob Lowry, who showed me the importance of making thought answerable to life. I also acknowledge friends who supported me in hard times: Brijen Gupta, Gerard Macdonald, Kathy Golski, Woycieck Dabrowski, Jennifer Shennan, Judith Loveridge, Ewen Macdonald, Keith Ridler, and Vincent O’Sullivan. I owe my first teaching position to Jan Pouwer. Hugh Kawharu offered me my first full-time academic job when I finished my Ph.D. at Cambridge. I have Michael Young, Derek Freeman, and Roger Keesing to thank for making possible my sojourns at the Australian National University (ANU). Without the timely interventions of Bob Tonkinson (ANU), Anita Jacobsen-Widding (Uppsala University), Michael Herzfeld (Indiana University), Susan Reynolds-White (the University of Copenhagen), and Robert Orsi (Harvard University), my academic career would not have survived its periodic disruptions. Ivan Karp helped me get two of my first books published, and, to the editors of my many subsequent books, I owe a similar debt of gratitude: Marianne Alenius, Marion Berghahn, Barbara Larson, Wendy Lochner, Reed Malcolm, Kate Marshall, Jim Lance, Priya Nelson, Penelope Todd, and Ken Wissoker. While Marcel Mauss and Claude Lévi-Strauss made exchange synonymous with sociality, the exchange of goods and services is sometimes less important than the exchange of experiences and points of view. In this spirit of conviviality, I thank the many individuals who welcomed me into their lifeworlds: Abdul Bockarie Marah, Ali Bockarie Marah, Isata Marah, Noah Bockarie Marah, Sewa Bockarie Marah, Rose Marah (nee Tucker), Sewa Magba Koroma, and Keti Ferenke Koroma in Sierra Leone, McGinty Salt in Australia, and Te Pakaka Tawhai in Aotearoa New Zealand. Finally, I lovingly acknowledge my first wife Pauline Jackson (nee Harris), my daughter Heidi Aisetta Jackson, my beloved wife Francine Lorimer, and our children Joshua Jackson and Freya Jackson, without whom my life would have been bereft of purpose and joy.
