Scholars use citations so that others may trace their evidence and arguments. But an eager researcher following the sources listed in the back of this volume would only get so far. For this book was made possible by a village of friends, colleagues, archivists, and strangers, whose encouragement, assistance, and kindness defy formal citation.

When I look back on my time in Sudan, I am truly humbled by the warmth and generosity of spirit of the people I met. Anyone who has conducted research abroad knows that even the most minor victories are often hard won. So many people, some of whom were near-strangers, went out of their way to offer help, and I regret that I cannot name them all. Drs. Gasim Bedri and Nafisa M. Bedri of the Ahfad University for Women sponsored both of my visas to Sudan and smoothed my entrance into university and government archives. In 2010, the coordinated efforts of Ali Ali-Dinar and Ambassador Akec Khoc helped to push a nervous graduate student's visa approval through at the last minute. Thank you to the staff at the National Records Office in Khartoum for accommodating a researcher with multiple interests. Thank you to the Institute of African and Asian Studies at University of Khartoum and in particular Khalid Abdalla of the Folklore Archive for opening their collections to me.

Outside the archives, Imam Gasmelseed, Kamal Ahmed, Hassan Abdelrahman, and Nagwa Mohamed Suliman all displayed enthusiasm for my work and, far more importantly, gave generously of their time to introduce me to their country. Dr. Ismail Elkhalfifa Suleiman and his family deserve special recognition for their kindness: Ihsan Ismail Adam Hassan filled me with good food, and Abdel Muhsin features in one of my favorite memories, of driving through Khartoum singing Adele's "Rolling in the Deep." I am grateful for the winds of chance that led me to bump into Sister Maryam outside St. Matthews Cathedral and the resulting glimpses of Khartoum that I had not seen before. My most heartfelt thanks to Dr. Nafisa Ahmed el Amin, Sittana Bedri, and Griselda el Tayib for sharing their stories with me. No matter where my day took me, in the evenings I returned to the incomparable hospitality of two generations of the Pagoulatos family and their staff at the Acropole Hotel. They made me feel like family from the very first; and the warmth that lit the hotel was matched only by the vibrancy of its iconic blue shutters.

In England, the Sudan Archive at Durham University is a delightful and sunny place to work. And no one could ask for more patient or responsive archivists than Jane Hogan, Francis Gotto, and Mike Harkness.

Historical research is a surprisingly expensive endeavor. Funding for the above travel and research as well as critical leave from teaching was made possible by generous grants from the American Association of University Women, the University of Kansas, the Mellon Mays Foundation, the Social Science Research Council, and the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation.

I have been fortunate to begin my career at the University of Kansas, where I am surrounded by lively and supportive colleagues. Paul Kelton introduced me to the workings of an academic department and was a steadying presence across the hall. Kim Warren read portions of this book and offered helpful feedback. Megan Greene graciously and thoughtfully read the entire manuscript twice and was always on call to answer any question. Katherine and Jonathan Clark offered royal accommodations and relaxation when the British archives proved too much. Tony Rosenthal had a sixth sense about knowing just when I needed to be taken out to lunch. Brad Osborn proved an unexpected but very much welcome companion on this publishing journey. And Benjamin Rosenthal never once doubted me or this project.

Comments and suggestion from the anonymous readers at Stanford University Press made this a better book. Many thanks to my editor, Kate Wahl, whose advice early on helped to shape this project and whose encouragement at the end kept me going. Thanks as well to Cassi Pittman and LaToya Tavernier, who both spent seven years keeping me accountable to this work. Portions of chapter five and the conclusion were previously published in “Fashioning their Place: Dress and Global Imagination in Imperial Sudan,” Gender & History 26 (2014); I appreciate the opportunity to expand on those arguments here.

A decade’s worth of thanks to Eve Troutt Powell, who continues to teach me what it means to be a scholar, a colleague, and a woman of color.

A final word of gratitude for my mother: who never said “no,” and taught me to work for, and expect only, the best.
