Acknowledgments

Donna Haraway, whose influence on my thinking will become clear throughout this book, has reminded us that we all live in, and as, multi-species worlds. None of us exist as independent individuals. So, too, writing and scholarship are collective enterprises in ways that we do not always articulate. Because it is impossible to thank everyone who supported me during the time I worked on this project, I want to acknowledge first the feedback and suggestions I received from many people, too numerous to list, who responded to my ideas in a wide range of contexts, both formal and informal.

Several organizations and program organizers deserve particular appreciation for giving me opportunities to further my thinking and writing about animal studies and biblical interpretation while I was writing this book. These include a Transdisciplinary Theological Colloquium at Drew Theological School in 2011, organized by Stephen D. Moore; the Reading, Theory, and the Bible Section of the Society of Biblical Literature, coordinated by Jennifer Koosed, Robert Seesengood, and Jay Twomey; a panel on “difference” and biblical interpretation, coordinated for the Society of Biblical Literature in 2012 by Erin Runions; the Visiting Scholar Colloquium at Swarthmore and Haverford Colleges in 2013, coordinated by Gwynn Kessler; the Gay Men’s Issues Group of the American Academy of Religion, which in 2013 organized a session on sexuality and animality coordinated by Scott Haldeman; a lecture for the Department of Philosophy and Religious Studies at Ball State University, organized by Joseph Marchal in 2015; the Eastern Great Lakes Biblical Society meeting in 2016, organized by Susan Haddox and Jonathan Lawrence; and the Feminist Hermeneutics Section and Ecological Hermeneutics Section of the Society of Biblical Literature.
My colleagues at Chicago Theological Seminary, including its Board of Trustees, President Alice Hunt, faculty, staff, and many students, supported the project through sabbatical leaves, patience with my distraction from other duties, and enthusiastic responses to presentations of my ideas. I am especially grateful to students in my course “Animals, Ecology, and Biblical Interpretation.”

A few individuals deserve a special word of appreciation. Tat-siong Benny Liew, Theodore Jennings, and Laurel Schneider prodded me for several years, and in several different ways, to bring animal studies to bear on biblical interpretation. Barbara J. King, an inspiration to all of us who are interested in animals, graciously read two of my chapters and encouraged the project. Jared Beverly read my entire manuscript and assisted me in the final stages of its preparation. Two anonymous readers for Stanford University Press gave me crucial feedback. Emily-Jane Cohen shepherded the project for Stanford University Press in ways that were always helpful.

It has become conventional in projects related to animal studies to acknowledge the support of one’s companion animals. During the time that I worked on this book, I benefited deeply from living alongside several of them, including Baldwin, Bayard, Duncan, and especially Mack, who patiently waited for me to get up from my computer and get out in the world.

But most of all I thank Adolfo Santos for his untiring support and encouragement, his companionship on occasions that brought us closer to animals, and our endless conversations about animals and the earth.
READING THE HEBREW BIBLE WITH ANIMAL STUDIES