HUAROCHIRÍ
An Andean Society Under Inca and Spanish Rule

Stanford University Press, Stanford, California
Who built the seven gates of Thebes?
The books are filled with names of kings.
Was it kings who hauled the craggy blocks of stone?
And Babylon, so many times destroyed,
Who built the city up each time? In which of Lima’s houses,
That city glittering with gold, lived those who built it?
In the evening when the Chinese wall was finished
Where did the masons go? Imperial Rome
Is full of arcs of triumph. Who reared them up? Over whom Did the Caesars triumph? Byzantium lives in song.
Were all her dwellings palaces? And even in Atlantis of the legend
The night the sea rushed in,
The drowning men still bellowed for their slaves.

Young Alexander conquered India.
He alone?
Caesar beat the Gauls.
Was there not even a cook in his army?
Philip of Spain wept as his fleet
Was sunk and destroyed. Were there no other tears?
Frederick the Great triumphed in the Seven Years War. Who Triumphed with him?

Each page a victory,
At whose expense the victory ball?
Every ten years a great man,
Who paid the piper?

So many facts.
So many questions.

To the creativity, the endurance, and the courage of the people who built Lima’s houses, mined its gold, and paid the piper.
Acknowledgments

This study is the product of twelve years, much of which were spent not in research but in mulling over, dissecting, and reconstructing, time and again, the material that I present in the following pages. It is impossible to thank all of the friends and colleagues who have helped me clarify my ideas through their comments and their criticism over the years, although in any expression of appreciation the students with whom I worked over the years at Columbia University and, for one short term, at Yale University belong at the top of the list. Many of these people are now colleagues and friends whose continuing friendship and comments I depend upon heavily. In particular, I want to thank Brooke Larson, Steve Stern, and Florencia Mallon, friends to whom this book is in part a response to their questions, their stimulating comments, and their support.

I also owe debts of gratitude, first, to the staff of the Archivo Nacional del Peru, where I spent many months with the aid and help of the staff and director, Dr. José Duran; second, to the Biblioteca Nacional del Peru, and in particular to Srta. Graciela Sanchez Cerro, one of the most able and helpful bibliographers I have met on either continent; and third, to the Archivo Nacional de la Nacion Argentina, repository of much valuable material on southern Peru and Bolivia for the period from 1776 to 1810. The staff of the Museo Mitre in Buenos Aires also made working in that lovely center a pleasure to remember. The able notaries of Peru, in towns and cities throughout the country, have always responded with graciousness and interest to my appeals for help, opening their archives—invaluable collections of important materials—to me. The people of Huarochirí shared with me and Tom Patterson their knowledge together with their beer in many hours that I remember fondly during the field season that I spent in the province in the summer of 1968. And many other friendships in Peru, built over the years, have made me always eager to return to a country I have grown to love.
I have received a great deal of support for this project, which began as a doctoral dissertation supported by the Woodrow Wilson Foundation. I want to thank the Social Science Research Council for making it possible for me to spend a year studying anthropology on a Research Training Fellowship in 1970–71, and for supporting my return to Peru on a related project in 1973. My summer work has also been supported by Rutgers University in Newark, where I worked from 1966 to 1970, and by the University of Delaware, which also supported the typing of the final manuscript. I also owe a debt of thanks to Marie Murray, who not only typed the final manuscript but corrected my grammar and caught my errors as we entered the final stretch together. And to Peter Kahn, whose editorial skills and discreet and patient prodding are responsible for getting this book into print, I owe very special thanks.

And finally, I want to thank the friends, now of more than a decade’s standing, who have been the source of ideas, comments, and criticism, who have stretched my mind, shared their knowledge and their insights, and put up with the long years I spent in building up and tearing down theories and concepts. My thanks to Saul Newton for the challenge and the support that finally got this book written. To John Rowe, John Murra, Herb Klein, Craig Morris, Tom Patterson, Anibal Quijano, and Manuel Valladares, in the United States and in Peru, thank you for your generosity and your friendship. And to the friends whose presence and interest laid the foundation for thinking and working over the years, thank you all.
