ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The number of people we want to recognize is not inconsequential for two reasons. The first is that many CEOs, executives, and colleagues—some of whom we are fortunate to also call friends—devoted their very scarce time to share their leadership team experiences or engaged in the backbreaking work of providing feedback on chapters—or both.

Another reason is that this book is the culmination of over twenty years of reading and reflecting on issues of power, networks, and dynamics at the top of organizations. Our reflection has been informed by executives and scholars who may only now discover that we sat atop their shoulders as we wrote this book.

But if the list seems long, it is, in truth, far too short, covering only a small percentage of those who contributed to it. We apologize in advance to those whose contribution we could not bring to our readers’ attention due to faulty memory retrieval systems.

Although this book’s primary audience is executives, we begin by thanking our university colleagues whose support and ideas permeate our work. At INSEAD, Charles Galunic, collaborated with both of us individually before we ever met. Many of the ideas explored in his book Backstage Leadership: The Invisible Work of Highly Effective Leaders, find echo in our own pages. Jose-Luis Alvarez and his coauthor, Silviya Svejenova, whose The Changing C-Suite: Executive Power in Transformation (2021) offers the most solid account of the transformation of leadership teams we have come across. Maria Guadalupe developed extensive and cutting-edge academic research on the key topic of our book. Andrew Shipilov manages to build bridges among various managerial disciplines, notably strategy and organizational behavior, and his thinking about networks is unique. Finally, it would be impossible to write about multinational leadership teams without acknowledging the challenges of leading across cultures that Erin Meyer has written about so lucidly.

At HEC Paris, we must thank Catherine Tanneau, who hired us to teach about executive power and thus enabled us to meet. There we also encountered Emmanuel Coblence, Paul Delahaie, and Rodolphe Durand, whose curiosity and incisive thinking gave us new perspectives on our chosen topic.

At HEC Montréal and McGill University, we thank Alain Gosselin, Réal Jacob, and Louis Hébert. Their wisdom lies just beneath the surface of many of our chapters. We are also grateful to Caroline Aubé, whose knowledge of the team literature proved invaluable over the years and whose thoughts also find their way into these pages after we spent hours collaborating on articles cowritten with Phanie Rioux who must also be saluted. Finally, we thank Éloi Lafontaine Beaumier, as well as Alaric Bourgoin for his contribution to Chapter 1.

At Bocconi University, we thank Paola Cillo and Isabella Pozzo whose thinking about how multiple forms of leadership (creative, business) interact is so rich.

We thank London Business School professor Herminia Ibarra, one of the planet’s great executive coaches, whose work on the challenges of transitioning to the C-suite has influenced our teaching of aspiring and current executives. The counsel of Thomas Roulet at the University of Cambridge proved critical in getting our project off the ground.

This book’s value stems in large part from the direct and indirect contribution of the hundreds of executives whose thoughts and actions are reflected in these pages. Those we mention next have titles affixed to them that are not always those they carry today but are ones they held when we crossed paths with them at one time or another.

Two CEOs we are particularly grateful to are Frank Piedelièvre of the Bureau Veritas Group, the global number 2 player in the testing, inspection, and certification industry, and Yves Masse, who was leader of a ridiculously complex public health services organization when we first met. Their vastly different styles show that great team stewardship comes in many guises.

Other CEOs we worked with and whom we often pestered to reveal the secrets of their craft were Roman Oryschuk of the General Electric Company (United Kingdom), Geoffrey Close and Yves Caprara of Prayon (Belgium), Marcel Cobuz at Holcim (Irak, Morocco), Yves Devin of the Montreal Casino (Canada), and Pierre Deleplanque at Heracles Cement (Greece).

Other CEOs we worked with and subjected to particularly fruitful grillings include Kamil Beffa at Louis Dreyfuss Armateurs (France), Emilio Imbriglio at RC Grant Thornton (Canada), Helmut Herold at Telesystem Energie (Germany), and David Redfern of Holcim (Canada).

The following CEOs are ones we learned from mostly by watching them in action: Thomas Buberl of the AXA Group (France); Alan Bollard of the APEC Secretariat (Singapore); Luc Beaudoin, chief of police in Gatineau (Canada); Pascal Casanova at LafargeHolcim (France); Matthieu de Tugny of the Bureau Veritas Group Marine Division (France); Kevin O’Brien of the Bureau Veritas Consumer Products Division (United States), Madeleine Paquin of Logistec Corporation (Canada); and Carine Paumier-Hub at Vapor Rail and Vapor Stone Rail System (United States/Canada).

The executives who taught us valuable lessons as we observed them include Magali Anderson, chief sustainability and innovation officer at Holcim (Switzerland); Arnaud André, executive vice president of human resources and organizational development of the Bureau Veritas Group (France); Lisa Bate, senior vice president of the Americas at Element Materials Technology (United States); André Beaulieu, senior vice president of corporate services at BCE (Canada); Philippe Bertin, chief human resource officer (CHRO) at Prayon (Belgium); Marc Blanxart, head of building at LafargeHolcim (Switzerland); Éric Drouin, vice president of strategy at Promutuel Insurance (Canada); Marc Ducharme, chief administrative officer at Fasken LLP; Caroline Luscombe, executive vice president of technology and operations at National Bank (Canada); Kathy Megery, vice president of global affairs at Sanofi North America (United States); Pierre Neatby, vice president of worldwide marketing at Ambatovy (Madagascar); Roger-Ketcha Ngassam, global head of strategic operations at Novartis (Switzerland); Jim Rosenberg, chief of staff at Jewish United Fund (United States); Sandrine Talbot Lagloire, vice president of sales at Bossard Group (Canada/United States); and Chris Wade, global head of internal communications, the Adecco Group (Switzerland).

Executives who explicitly shared their insights include Pascal Bécotte, member of the global executive committee at Russell Reynolds Associates; Annie Brisson, chief human resources officer of the Jean Coutu Group (Canada); Julie Lévesque, executive vice president of technology and operations at National Bank (Canada); Kathy Megery, vice president of global affairs at Sanofi North America (United States); Pierre Neatby, vice president of worldwide marketing at Ambatovy (Madagascar); Roger-Ketcha Ngassam, global head of strategic operations at Novartis (Switzerland); Jim Rosenberg, chief of staff at Jewish United Fund (United States); Sandrine Talbot Lagloire, vice president of sales at Bossard Group (Canada/United States); and Chris Wade, global head of internal communications, the Adecco Group (Switzerland).

Special mention must go to the following individuals. First is Andrea Bogusz, head of talent and learning at the GEA Group (Germany), whose prac-technical understanding of power and politics is truly remarkable. The insights of François Trudel, chief human resources officer at Randstad (Canada), and Philippe Redaelli, managing director of chain market data at Kaiko (France) on leadership at the top, have had a greater impact than they probably imagined. We also thank Antoine Tirard, global head of talent acquisition and management at LVMH Moët Hennessy-Louis Vuitton.

Unsurprisingly, we received tremendous support from several consultants, many of whom have also toiled as executives. Their insights over the years proved invaluable. They include Jad Bitar, managing director of Boston Consulting Group in Dubai; Madeleine Chenette, Canadian ambassador to the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development; Philippe Frizon, vice president of strategy at Desjardins General Insurance Group; Frédéric Gascon, chief operating officer at PayFacto; Philippe Mauchard of McKinsey & Company in Belgium; Kevin O’Brien, head of international markets at WeightWatchers; and Aurèle Thériault at Interlocus. Finally, Henry Zinglersen, president of MindLab (Denmark), is one of the world’s great cross-cultural experts, who, with Mark Aspinall of the United Kingdom, deserves much of the credit for the Purpose-Outcomes-Process (POP) framework discussed in Chapter 6.

Mere thanks to our family and friend are a poor reward for the time and intelligence Nicole Neatby and Bronwen Griffiths applied in reading chapter drafts. We also thank David Chemla whose experience as an executive and eye for detail served us well. Extra special thanks are extended to Lisa Yarmoshuk whose efforts and insights, married to an exceptional and unique mix of competencies, so greatly improved the final book that we were blessed to have her support.

At Stanford University Press, thanks to the entire team and especially to Cindy Lim and senior editor Steve Catalano. We could not be more grateful for how they expertly shepherded us through the process and engaged in the content with us, often waking up very early so that it would be convenient for Montréal-based Jacques and Paris-based Frédéric. The way they prodded us to submit drafts to meet tight deadlines offered lessons in leadership that may well find their way into our next book.

For those who were wondering, the red weight hanging from a metal thread on the cover of the original Stanford University Press edition of this book is a plumb line, carrying at its end a weight known as a plumb bob. This device has been used for centuries to check that a structure or wall is perfectly vertical or that it slopes at the correct angle. In other words, it is used to ensure something is aligned and thus seemed appropriate for this book’s cover.
