PEDAGOGY OF A BELOVED COMMONS
POLIS: Fordham Series in Urban Studies
Edited by Daniel J. Monti, Saint Louis University

POLIS will address the questions of what makes a good community and how urban dwellers succeed and fail to live up to the idea that people from various backgrounds and levels of society can live together effectively, if not always congenially. The series is the province of no single discipline; we are searching for authors in fields as diverse as American studies, anthropology, history, political science, sociology, and urban studies who can write for both academic and informed lay audiences. Our objective is to celebrate and critically assess the customary ways in which urbanites make the world corrigeable for themselves and the other kinds of people with whom they come into contact every day.

To this end, we will publish both book-length manuscripts and a series of “digital shorts” (e-books) focusing on case studies of groups, locales, and events that provide clues as to how urban people accomplish this delicate and exciting task. We expect to publish one or two books every year but a larger number of “digital shorts.” The digital shorts will be 20,000 words or fewer and have a strong narrative voice.

SERIES ADVISORY BOARD:
Michael Ian Borer, University of Nevada–Las Vegas
Japonica Brown-Saracino, Boston University
Michael Goodman, UMass Dartmouth
R. Scott Hanson, The University of Pennsylvania
Annika Hinze, Fordham University
Elaine Lewinnek, California State University–Fullerton
Ben Looker, Saint Louis University
Ali Modarres, University of Washington–Tacoma
Bruce O’Neil, Saint Louis University