One of the themes of this work is that creatures exist in dependence on their creator and other creatures. This is as true of authors as of any other creatures. Writing this book would not have been possible without generous time and support given by many people. This project began with a conversation with Walter Moberly. While working on a thesis proposal, I commented that I’d like to write on creation but wasn’t sure there was anything left to say. Walter asked if I had thought at all about creation ex nihilo in relation to Gen 1. I hadn’t. From that early stage of developing a thesis proposal to recently discussing some of the final revisions of this manuscript, Walter has shown me how to reframe issues in an illuminating manner, to read charitably, write carefully, and in general has provided a model for the kind of biblical scholar I would like to be.

In numerous ways my parents and in-laws have made this project possible. My parents, Matt and Barbara Chambers, have frequently taken our children for a few hours, providing time for reading, writing, and revising. I’ve enjoyed trying out ideas on my dad during our runs. My parents once commented that they didn’t know how as such pragmatic people their son ended up interested in rather abstract issues like hermeneutics and creation ex nihilo. But the truth is that I never would have found myself on this path if they hadn’t taught me to love scripture and scripture’s God from a young age.

A number of readers have helped shape this book. Robert Hayward was my secondary supervisor, and especially helped with the argument in chapter 4. Hans Boersma and Brant Bosserman offered helpful feedback on early versions of chapters 2 and 3 and Brant commented on a draft of the entire manuscript. Andrew Mein and Walter Houston served as my examiners. Their gracious suggestions improved my thesis in a number of ways. Matthew Levering and John Goldingay both read this manuscript, provided insightful and encouraging comments, and helped this work find a publisher. In the fall of 2017, I was a research fellow at the Henry Center for Theological Understanding, funded by the Templeton Religion Trust. This supported the initial revision of my thesis for publication and provided opportunity to discuss portions of this work with Joel Chopp, Marc Cortez, Geoff Fulkerson, Danny Houck, and Gavin Ortlund. Conferences sponsored by the Henry Center led to a number of clarifying conversations with Daniel Driver and Kevin Vanhoozer as well as Jack Collins, who read and commented on this manuscript in its entirety.

Murray Rae, the editor of this series, Jen Singletary, and the team at Eisenbrauns/Penn State University Press have been very helpful as I have prepared this manuscript for publication. I am also grateful for permission to reuse portions of “Genesis 1.1 as the First Act of Creation,” Journal for the Study of the Old Testament 43/3 (2019): 385–94, copyright Sage Publishing, DOI 10.1177/0309089217734746 and “Divine and creaturely agency in Genesis 1,” Scottish Journal of Theology 72/1 (2019): 1-19, copyright Cambridge University Press, DOI 10.1017/S0036930618000662 in chapter 6.

This project required the patience of my children: Elizabeth, Ethan, Evangeline, and Ezra. I am thankful for their understanding. This work was nourished by the love and support of my wife, Kelsey. She has carved out space in our house and schedule for me to read and write, and has put up with stacks of books and papers for years. This never would have come to fruition without Kelsey’s encouragement and sacrifice. For this, and much else, I am eternally grateful. “He who finds a wife finds a good thing and obtains favor from YHWH” (Prov 18:22). This has certainly been true in my life!
