WE THANK LYNNE RIENNER FOR ALLOWING US TO PURSUE THIS project. Both of us have taught classes on women’s rights and public policy, and our experiences in the classroom played an important role in guiding us toward the material we wished to include here. Therefore, in addition to more traditional topics in women’s rights policymaking, such as Title VII and employment, the Family and Medical Leave Act, and reproductive rights, we write about the #MeToo movement, the role of Title IX on college campuses, the disparate treatment of women and men in championship basketball tournaments, and the multifaceted efforts of the US women’s national soccer team to redress their pay inequity. We hope our readers will see how these issues affect their own lives and the greater society. By explaining the influence of various institutions on policy outcomes, we also hope to provide a better understanding of how readers can participate in the fight for gender equality.

Susan thanks her husband, Michael, for his assistance in advancing this project, as he always does, by supporting her research and writing. She also extends her love to her family: her son, Jason, his wife, Deirdre, and their children, Norah, Paul, and Daniel; and her daughter, Jennifer, her husband, Jonathan, and their children, Rebecca and Benjamin. She dedicates this book to them.

Megan thanks her family and friends for the encouragement and much-needed levity they provided while she buried herself in teaching and research. In particular, she thanks Claudio Katz for the years of guidance and friendship during his time at Loyola and beyond. She is most grateful to her parents, Michelle and Mike, for their unending support. She dedicates this book to them.
