This comparative study of democracy, and the conference in December of 1985 to discuss the first drafts of the case studies, were made possible by a generous grant from the National Endowment for Democracy. The Endowment is a private, nonprofit organization which seeks to encourage and strengthen democratic institutions around the world through nongovernmental efforts. Since its creation in 1983, N.E.D. has been an extremely creative and effective institution. The editors and authors gratefully acknowledge the support of the Endowment, and in particular of its President, Carl Gershman, and Director of Program, Marc F. Plattner. The Hoover Institution, with which Diamond and Lipset are affiliated, also contributed in many substantial ways to the project during its more than three years of organization, writing, and production. We wish to thank in particular the Director of the Hoover Institution, W. Glenn Campbell, and the two Principal Associate Directors with whom we have worked, John F. Cogan and John Raisian. The final editing and production of this volume were also assisted by a grant to the Hoover Institution from the MacArthur Foundation for a program of research on democracy in developing countries.

A number of people helped us in arranging the 1985 conference and preparing this volume. We thank in particular Janet Shaw of the Hoover Institution for her excellent editing, typing, and administrative support; Lisa Fuentes, now at UCLA, who was our research and administrative assistant during 1985–1986; Katherine Teghtsoonian, now at the University of Seattle, who produced the proceedings of our conference; Juliet Johnston and Laura Morrow, for their assistance with indexing, proofreading, and library research; Connie L. McNeely, for her statistical support; and Nicole S. Barnes, whose efficient and cheerful assistance with typing, indexing, and production has been instrumental to the completion of this book.
