Notes on Contributors

Mary Jane Androne, Professor of English, is Co-Director of Africana Studies at Albright College in Reading, Pennsylvania. Her current scholarship centres on African and African American women writers and her publications include articles on Tsitsi Dangarembga, Mariama Bâ, Julie Dash, Nawal El Saadawi, and Ama Ata Aidoo.

Juliana Daniels is a Lecturer in the Department of English Education at the Community University College, Takoradi. Her research interests include women’s writings and children’s literature. She is currently working on heroines in West African war novels.

Blessing Dialo-Ogamba, Associate Professor of English at Coppin State University, Baltimore, Maryland, teaches courses in World Literature (African, Asian, Latin American, and British writers). Her research interests are women’s and children’s literature.

Louisa Uchum Egbunike is a PhD candidate in the Africa Department at the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS), University of London. She is also one of the organisers of the annual Igbo Studies Conference held at SOAS.

Eve Eisenberg is a doctoral student in the Department of English at Indiana University-Bloomington, where she also teaches. Her dissertation which she hopes to defend in 2014, discusses rewriting as a genre of Africa and its diaspora.

Maureen Eke, Professor of English at Central Michigan University, Mount Pleasant, teaches courses in African Diaspora Literatures, postcolonial literatures and theory as well as women’s writing. She has published widely on African Literature and Cinema.

Imene Moulati teaches at Saad Dahleb University in Algeria. A recent Fulbright scholar at Central Michigan University, Mount Pleasant, her research interests include trauma literature, psychoanalysis and postmodern philosophy.

Tinashe Mushakavanhu read for a PhD in English at the University of Kent, England. He graduated with a first class honours in English from Midlands State University, Zimbabwe and became the first African to receive an MA in Creative Writing at Trinity College, Carmarthen, Wales. He co-edited State of the Nation: Contemporary Zimbabwean Poetry (2009). He is currently a part-time lecturer in English at Africa University, Zimbabwe.

Regina Okafor, formerly Senior Lecturer in the Department of Modern Languages and Literatures at the University of Port Harcourt, Nigeria, currently teaches in the Department of World Languages and Cultures at Howard University, Washington, DC. She has published journal articles on African Literature.

Rose A. Sackeyfio is an Associate Professor in the Department of English at Winston Salem State University, North Carolina. She completed a PhD (1992) in Education at the Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, Nigeria where she taught for ten years. Her scholarship and research pursuits examine the literature of African and African American women. She has published critical essays that explore various aspects of the lives of African women in a global arena.

Hellen Roselyne Shigali is a Senior Lecturer in the Department of Literature, Theatre and Film Studies, Eldoret University, Kenya. Her publications include Alternative Conceptualization of Empowerment: African Gender Perspective (2010).

Iniobong Uko is a Professor of English, and currently Director of Pre-Degree Studies, University of Uyo, Nigeria. Her research interests are women's writing and a cross-cultural study of African and Diasporic women's writings. She has participated in several women's activities and initiatives in Nigeria and abroad, and has published extensively in journals and books in Nigeria, Ghana, Germany, the US and UK. She is the author of the seminal book, Gender and Identity in the Works of Osonye Tess Onwueme (2004).

Lindsey Zanchettin is a PhD candidate at Auburn University, Alabama, with a focus on African and African Diaspora literatures, feminist theory and women's studies. Her dissertation examines notions of expatriatism in the texts of women writers from Africa and the Diaspora.