Acknowledgements

This book originates from the British Association's Festival of Science at Salford in 2003 where the ‘Anthropology and Archaeology Section’ and ‘General Section’ arranged coordinated sessions entitled ‘Local Science versus Global Science’ and ‘Traditional Knowledge and Modern Science’. I am grateful to David Shankland, then Recorder to the ‘Anthropology and Archaeology Section’, for all of his support and encouragement, without which the event would not have been anything like as successful. I also thank David Dickson, the Recorder to the ‘General Section’, for coordinating his session with us and kindly agreeing to some of the contributors publishing their papers in this volume. Other contributions come from papers presented at the Association of Social Anthropologists’ Decennial Conference at Manchester in 2003 in a panel entitled ‘Beyond Science: Approaches to Local Knowledge in Development’. I thank all those who participated in these events for their intellectual support. I also thank my wife Jackie for her unfailing assistance and encouragement. For generous financial support of the events at which colleagues presented the papers in this volume, we thank the British Academy, British Association, Royal Anthropological Institute, Association of Social Anthropologists of the U.K. and Commonwealth, Arts and Humanities Research Board, and the Wenner-Gren Foundation.
