Acknowledgments

A volume that involves the participation of seventeen collaborators depends on all contributors for its success. We are therefore extremely grateful for all the authors who agreed to join us in this project and who generously shared with us their time, expertise, and commitment to understanding Marseille. We are also indebted to our four translators, who collectively translated nine chapters originally written in French: Willemina Don, Helen Fishman, Hilary S. Handin, and Annie Jamison. It is safe to say we could not have completed this project without such a stellar team of authors and translators, and we thank each of you for making this project possible.

While we have received much assistance from our authors, we extend a special thank you to Jean-Christophe Sevin, who was there at the very beginning of this project and has been a rich source of information and advice throughout the process. We are also grateful to many other friends and colleagues who shaped our thinking about Marseille and the book as a whole. For their astute guidance and helpful suggestions, we thank Jany Cianferani and Patricia Plutino. For helping us identify scholarly contributors, we are grateful to Rachida Brahim, Sophie Chevalier, and Claire Duport.

We also benefitted from the support and expertise of many people outside of Marseille who helped us bring this project to completion. Mika Natif steered us toward relevant research in art history regarding mosaics. Isabelle Genest, Frédéric Viguier, and Victor Reinking shared their contacts for translators, while Herrick Chapman provided invaluable advice and insights on our search for a publisher. We are so delighted to have placed this project with Berghahn Books and thank Amanda Horn for seeing this project’s potential and ushering us through the review and revision process with enthusiasm and flexibility. Sulaiman Ahmad has performed miracles with the formatting and preparation of the book’s many images. Finally, this book benefitted enormously from the critical attention and probing questions asked by the anonymous peer reviewers of Berghahn. We thank them for their especially careful and nuanced reading, and their insightful comments and suggestions.

Mark is grateful to Goucher College, particularly to the Jane Russell Fund, which supported research that contributed to this book. Goucher’s Center for the Advancement of Scholarship and Teaching provided funding to help with production expenses. For their hard work in support of faculty scholarship at Goucher, Mark would like to thank Jamie Mullaney, Associate Provost for Faculty Affairs, and William Harder, director of the CAST center. For stimulating discussions and inspiration, he also thanks his Goucher colleagues, especially those in French Transnational Studies: Flo Martin and Kathryn St. Ours.

At The George Washington University, Kathryn would like to thank the many colleagues and friends who have supported her research and writing over the past several years. Masha Belenky and Lynn Westwater convened a talk series entitled Lit@GW, which provided an early forum for preliminary research on Marseille and Jean Contrucci, the author discussed here. Yongwu Rong and Evie Downie, Vice Deans for Research in the Columbian College of Arts and Sciences, have supported this project by providing one of the most precious commodities of all: time. A Dean’s Research Chair fellowship allowed greater focus on the manuscript at key points of compilation and revision. And perhaps most important, a grant via the Humanities Facilitating Fund, sponsored by GW’s Office of the Vice Provost for Research and organized by Lynn Westwater and Jamie Cohen-Cole, funded the translations of the French essays included here.

Beyond our academic support network, we also thank our friends and families who have championed our research and work on this volume. Mark thanks his children Emmett, Noble, and Isabel for their thoughtful comments and their encouragement throughout what has been a quite extended research project. For her insightful suggestions, consistent good cheer, and so much more, Mark offers a world of thanks to his wife, Lydia. Kathryn thanks her parents, Mark and Margaret Kleppinger, who have always demonstrated a keen interest in academic endeavors and who provided countless hours of childcare throughout the COVID pandemic so this project could advance. To her husband, Sylvester, and children, Franklin and Liviana, born during the final editing stages of this book, Kathryn says thank you for allowing The Marseille Mosaic to share my attention and focus over the past two plus years!
