This biography is the culmination of a long and, at times, challenging process: sometimes the difficulties were self-imposed (such as the usual demons of self-doubt); sometimes they were beyond my control (for example, the frustratingly limited access to some archival material).

Nevertheless, with the assistance of various individuals and institutions over roughly four years, it was possible to construct a reasonably coherent narrative of Brutus’s early life and writing in South Africa.

The Academic and Non-Fiction Authors’ Association of South Africa provided the initial funding for my research through its Grant Scheme for Authors in December 2015.

The English Department of Stellenbosch University subsequently granted me a Mellon Foundation-funded postdoctoral fellowship from 2016 to 2018, which gave me the much-needed time and space to continue this project.

In particular, I am indebted to Professor Shaun Viljoen for his support during this period. His calm demeanour and reassuring advice often helped to sustain me when the project threatened to become too burdened with obstacles.

During my initial research I revisited some of the material on which I based my doctorate on Brutus’s poetry under the supervision of Doctor Roger Field from the University of the Western Cape’s English Department.

I then turned to various archives to obtain Brutus’s own accounts of his life. I am truly grateful to Antony Brutus and his siblings – Jacinta, Marc, Justina, Cornelia, Gregory and Paula – for so kindly granting me permission to quote from their father’s material. Their generosity enriched this project beyond measure.

The most important archive was the Amazwi South African Museum of Literature (formerly the National English Literary Museum) in Makhanda. Cecilia Blight and Mariss Stevens (both now retired), along with the ever-helpful Andrew Martin, deserve to be singled out for their unfailing responsiveness to my requests for information.

The Borthwick Institute for Archives at the University of York in the United Kingdom also provided invaluable material on Brutus and his various activities, especially in sport and politics.

The audio recordings of interviews with Brutus at the Harry Ransom Center of the University of Texas in the United States, to which Professor Bernth Lindfors kindly drew my attention, also enabled me to fill in some important gaps.

For historical and literary material, staff at the Special Collections archive at the J.W. Jagger Library of the University of Cape Town (in particular, Clive Kirkwood) and the Centre for African Literary Studies at the University of KwaZulu-Natal in Pietermaritzburg (most notably, Colleen Vietzen) were very helpful in providing access to their treasure troves.
A special word of thanks also goes to Babalwa Solwandle of the UWC-Robben Island Museum Mayibuye Archives at the University of the Western Cape and to Doctor Cornelius Thomas of Rhodes University’s Cory Library for readily granting me permission to use material from their collections.

Zahira Adams-Ngoepe of the National Archives of South Africa (NARSA) in Pretoria assisted me in accessing material from police files. However, despite an application through the Promotion of Access to Information Act, several enquiries to the South African Police Service about files that NARSA sent to them for declassification were not responded to at all.

The Department of Justice and Constitutional Development, on the other hand, responded positively to a request under the same Act, and made available the records of Brutus’s trial in the Johannesburg Regional Court.

Cedric Bendeman of the St Augustine’s Catholic Cathedral in Port Elizabeth and Helena Glanville of the Archives of the Catholic Diocese of Port Elizabeth graciously tracked down records of Brutus’s baptism and marriage, while Ashabai Chinyemba of Wits University traced details of his registration there as a law student.

Staff at the National Library of South Africa in Cape Town and the Bessie Head Library in Pietermaritzburg, especially Eshara Singh, helped me to gain access to their indispensable collections of newspapers published in South Africa during the 1950s and 1960s.

In addition to consulting various archives, I contacted several individuals who knew Brutus or interacted with him in some way. Among those who responded favourably were his daughter Jacinta (now Robertson), his nephew Vaughn Fayle (the son of his sister Catherine), and his nephews Gregory and Paul Yon (the sons of his sister Helen).

Others who generously provided information and added much substance to this biography were several of Brutus’s former pupils at Paterson High School: Fred Simon, Lionel Adriaan, Peter Carelse, Mervyn Rousseau, Urvin Coetzee, Gerald Jeftha and Neville Murison. Former South End High School pupil Doctor Elroy Schroeder was also very obliging.

Theresa Laing, a former North End neighbour who taught some of Brutus’s children at St Monica’s Primary School, and Doctor Lionel Smith, whose father Gordon was a South End High teacher and used to play cricket with Brutus, helped to make Brutus’s life story come alive.

Former Wits University student Sybil Marcus and political activists Blanche la Guma and M.P. Giyose were extremely helpful, too, while ex-Robben Islanders Ahmed Kathrada, Eddie Daniels and Lionel Davis offered much new information and insight into Brutus’s time in prison.

I am grateful as well to Ludumo Magwaca and Phillip Kgaphola, newspaper librarians at Arena Holdings (formerly Tiso Blackstar Group) in Port Elizabeth and Johannesburg respectively, for the rare images of Brutus and his family from the early 1960s. I am also indebted to Carol Victor of the Africana Library of the Nelson Mandela Bay Library Service for her assistance with photographs of mid-twentieth-century Port Elizabeth.

Others who were supportive in various ways include former University of Texas academic Professor Hal Wylie, former journalist and writer Ronnie Govender, Nelson Mandela University’s Robert Pearce, Allan Zinn and Michael Barry, and ex-school principal Hamilton Petersen and Doctor Basil Brown of the New Unity Movement.

However, this project would have come to nought without Jeremy Wightman, the publishing director of the HSRC Press and its imprint Best Red. His enthusiastic support of this work was humbling.

HSRC Press editorial project manager Samantha Hoaeane and publisher Mthunzi Nxawe ably saw the manuscript through the production process. They were, at all times, the epitome of professionalism. So, too, were Moira Richards, who sensitively edited the manuscript, and HSRC Press permissions researcher Kathy Brookes, who displayed exceptional diligence.

Professor André Odendaal, publisher of the African Lives Series, will no doubt enable this book to reach a wider readership. It is gratifying to have the support of such a groundbreaking project.

On a more personal note, I am grateful to Doctor Maylene Shung King, a friend from my high school days, who put me in touch with Fred Simon, the first person I interviewed for this biography. He and his son, Michael Simon, pointed me in the direction of several potential sources of information, and made a lasting impression on me with various acts of kindness.

In addition, I owe a great debt to my wife and confidante, Maud, for tolerating my obsession with the life and poetry of Brutus for nearly a decade. No doubt it was not always easy, but not once did she attempt to dissuade me. For that, she has my eternal gratitude.

A special word of thanks to my late parents, John and Rhona, for unwittingly setting me off on this journey all those many years ago. A home filled with books (Charles Dickens alongside James Hadley Chase), newspapers and magazines was a gift that has lasted me a lifetime.

My teacher Denzil la Pere (Bosmont First Primary School, Johannesburg) was the first to build on this foundation. Rebecca Sharp (now McPherson), Marthinus Rittles and John Doyle (Maria Louw High School, Queenstown) also played an inspirational part in nurturing my love for language and literature. Much later came the expertise of Professor Elizabeth Gunner, then at the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London.

I am also grateful to my siblings – Eugene, Colin, Rossana, Vanessa and Fiona – for their keen interest in my various endeavours over the years. I treasure their love and support, as well as that of their families.

Thank you all.
