Acknowledgments

It is with great joy and gratitude that I make mention of professional and personal (and in many instances both) influences without whose help and support this project would not have come to fruition. This monograph first took shape as a doctoral thesis under the indispensable supervision of Karla Pollmann, whose erudition and industry I have continued to call upon even after graduating. I should also like to thank the Leverhulme Trust for their generous grant to the After Augustine Project, which allowed me to study at St Andrews with Karla Pollmann and ultimately produce this work. They should be applauded for their readiness and willingness to support the vision and talent of Karla Pollmann in filling a much needed niche in the study of Augustine.

The entire school of Classics at the University of St Andrews, faculty and staff, deserve my thanks – notably Roger Rees, who served as a reader of this work in its thesis form and offered many fine recommendations and corrections to make it of publishable quality, and Harry Hine, who kindly and astutely read and commented on sections of my translation. I should like to thank too my former colleagues at Baylor University, where my scholarship and teaching were refined. Alden Smith has been a tireless supporter and encouragement of not only this endeavor, but my career. I also frequented the desk of David Lyle Jeffrey, whose wealth of knowledge has proved greatly beneficial in this project. Brent Froberg and Jeff Hunt also kindly read portions of this work; it is better on many levels because of them.

Wake Forest University has not only been a haven within which I am privileged to work, but has extended tremendous support and resources. The library staff of Wake Forest, and particularly Carol Cramer, proved indispensable. My superlative colleagues at Wake Forest in the Classical Languages Department, James Powell, Mary Pendergraft, and John Oksanish, have helped shape this work through their encouragement, insight, and constant support; Jim especially improved its quality through his exceptional reading, astute suggestions, and the specifically allotted meetings for discussion. Additionally, Mariah Wright and Andrew Camp (undergraduate students of Classical Languages at Wake Forest) each pored over the final versions, for which I am very grateful.

Not only has the scholarship of John Contreni been very influential on this thesis, but he also graciously read and commented on a chapter in its early form, even though we have never met nor have any connection other than sharing the same vineyard. Roger P. H. Green immensely improved this work through his role as one of my PhD examiners. His talents as a translator and vision for its appropriate form as a monograph were happily received.

The staff at De Gruyter press are likewise deserving of my gratitude. I know of only a few names, but assuredly many more were involved: Katrin Hofmann and Maria Erge were exceedingly patient, kind, and very good at their work.

Lastly, my parents, six siblings and their spouses, and wonderful in-laws have been my most enthusiastic supporters throughout. My father, a venerable Pauline scholar, deserves special thanks for his patient reading and thoughtful responses and suggestions to my work from start to finish. I owe sincerest praise and thanks also to my mother who has been an aid in all matters.

While I have enjoyed the input of many, all faults and errors within are my own.

This work is dedicated to my wife, Ali Gardner Sloan. I know of only a fraction of the sacrifices she made as this book was written, for those I am endlessly indebted. Her presence in my life is a continual blessing; it is a joy to share this life with her and now too with our beloved children, Collier and Kaira.
