Acknowledgements

This book is a revised and expanded version of the second half of my Italian doctoral dissertation (“Preplatonic Epic Exegesis: Hecataeus of Miletus and Acusilaus of Argos “Rhapsodes in Prose””), written in Rome, Oxford, and Bristol, and defended in March 2016 at the University of Rome “La Sapienza”. Since then, I have translated into English the whole section about Acusilaus and wrote the introduction anew. I would have not been able to deal with this additional amount of work without the generous support of the “Italian Institute for Historical Studies” in Naples and the Humboldt Foundation, which awarded me respectively a one- and a two-years post doctoral fellowships. To both institutions I owe my deepest thanks. I am also grateful to the Hardt Foundation for a two-weeks scientific stay in September 2015.

Over the years, many people contributed to the development of this commentary in many different ways. My supervisor, Roberto Nicolai, has read the entire manuscript before submission to the publisher and offered invaluable instruction of matters great and small. My thesis examiner, Robert Fowler, has been the first to think that I had something relevant to say about Acusilaus: since my visiting fellowship in Bristol in 2014, he has always been generous with his time and encouragement. To both of them I owe a very large intellectual debt. I am also thankful to the other two examiners of my dissertation, Adele Cozzoli and Alessandro Barchiesi, for their helpful recommendations. Much of the transformation of the thesis into a book took place in Naples and in Heidelberg. I thank my mentor at the “Instituto Croce”, Andrea Giardina, for his support. I am also very grateful to my host in Heidelberg, Jonas Grethlein, not only for his hospitality, but also for his willingness to discuss my work and provide thoughtful feedback on it.

This book has benefited, at various stages, from comments on drafts by numerous people, who gave me invaluable advice and saved me from several slips: Luca Bettarini, Albio Cesare Cassio, Thomas Kuhn-Treichel, Enrico Emanuele Prodi, Athanassios Vergados, and Gertjan Verhasselt. Needless to say, whatever mistakes and faults remain are solely my responsibility.

In occasion of several conferences I had the chance of discussing with people who shared with me their ideas and helped me refine my views on early Greek mythography, such as the panel on mythography at “The VIII Celtic Conference in Classics” organized by Scott Smith and Stephen Trzaskoma in 2014, the seminar series “Seminari di Letteratura Greca Luigi Enrico Rossi” on Hesiod and his reception at Rome “La Sapienza”, the King’s College London Postgraduate Conference in 2015, the fellows’ research seminar at the Institute in Naples in 2017, and finally the “Gräzistisches Forschungskolloquium” in Heidelberg in 2018. To all of them I am most grateful. I also thank Luuk Huitink for his stimulating criticism of my overall approach to early Greek prose. A special thank goes to my colleague and friend Elena Spangenberg Yanes, who read the whole manuscript prior to submission, even if its topic lies far away from her research interests, and to Irene Giaquinta and Jessica Romney, who helped me at proof stage.

I would like to thank Serena Pirrotta at De Gruyter for her crucial role in keeping the publication of this book on track. The series “Trends in Classics” had provided a congenial home for it and I truly thank its editors, Franco Montanari and Antonios Rengakos, for accepting it. Special thanks are due to the whole staff at De Gruyter for their patience and attentive care during the book production, and to Ben McGuire and Rachel Monland, who have carefully proofread the manuscript.

I dedicate this book to my family and to Tommaso: without their tireless moral support it would have never seen the light and I would have not been able to weather all the difficulties that came along the way.

Heidelberg, October 2018