

Acknowledgments

This book is the outcome of a multi-year project. It started off as a PhD thesis at the University of Groningen's department of Middle Eastern Studies. Its true origins, however, can be traced back to 2011, when I had just finished my MA and had obtained my first teaching position. That year I was lucky enough to acquire a unique collection of Arabic books and newspapers from the late Professor J.J.G. (Hans) Jansen, for which I am still very thankful up to this day. This collection included, among other things, (mostly) complete collections of Arabic journals and newspapers from the 1970s and 1980s, all leather-bound and collected in a most orderly manner. The Muslim Brotherhood journals al-Da'wa and Liwa' al-Islam immediately caught my eye and this fascination, which has not disappeared up to this day, resulted in a research proposal, a position as Lecturer-PhD and eventually a cum laude PhD and a permanent position as Assistant Professor at the University of Groningen's Department of Middle Eastern Studies, for which I could not have been more thankful.

I would like to express my gratitude, first of all, to my Doktorvater, Professor Wout J. van Bekkum, without whom I could not have written this book. He was there from the very beginning of my academic career, starting with my first Hebrew classes as a 19-year old first-year student Languages and Cultures of the Middle East, up until the present day. He has been a continuous source of inspiration over the past fourteen year. I have always very much appreciated him on a professional, intellectual and, of course, personal level and I cannot emphasize enough how thankful I am for all his supervision and overall mentorship. Moreover, I wish to express my deep appreciation for his tireless dedication to the Department and its staff members. Even though his retirement is nearing, I am convinced that we will continue to see each other and eat our occasional kroket (preferably with Nick Cave in the background).

I also wish to thank Professor Uri M. Kupferschmidt. First for coming to Groningen for the defense of my PhD and most importantly for his essential feedback and thorough reviews of my book over the last two years. Those Skype sessions we had were invaluable (both on an academic and a personal level) and he continuously challenged me intellectually and gave me the confidence to overturn, reshuffle and rewrite all the chapters, despite his own busy schedule. This feedback was very much appreciated and I hope to come and visit him and Tamar soon in Haifa.

Additionally, a word of thanks also goes out to Dr. Sophie Wagenhofer (and all her colleagues) from De Gruyter. I very much appreciate her faith and tireless efforts to make this book into a success. Her relaxed attitude and personal approach made the whole process of writing so much more easy-going and I hope to get back soon with a new book proposal.

A big thank you also needs to go out to my dear colleagues from the Department of Middle Eastern Studies, who made the long working days so much more bearable. Although I had to de-socialize for a few weeks in order to finish this book, I am looking forward to many more lunches, drinks and dinners.

I also wish to thank the Faculty of Arts of the University of Groningen, especially the Groningen Research Institute for the Study of Culture (ICOG) for the research time to write this book. This book could not have been finished without all the intellectual input and inspiration I received at the conferences and workshops I was able to attend. Although we all spend so much time on teaching, I am thankful for being in a privileged position with allocated research time, especially in the current academic climate of temporary employment and small teaching positions.

Of course I also have to thank Djoeke Dijksterhuis, who tirelessly edited all the versions of this book. Additionally, a big thank you goes out to the support staff of the Faculty of Arts, especially the Secretariat of European Languages, who make life so much easier and provided me with much-needed laughs, baked goods and sugary snacks from time to time.

I am also greatly indebted to the Moshe Dayan Center's Arabic Press Archives for helping me obtain missing issues of, among other things, Liwa' al-Islam, but also for giving me a warm welcome, being incredibly helpful and thinking along with me.

Of course, I would briefly like to extend my thanks to several people outside of the academic world as well. First to my family and friends, for standing by my side unconditionally and for always bringing me down to earth again, reminding me of the fact that there is more to life than Muslim Brotherhood journals and teaching. They have kept me sane and I feel enormously privileged with such a strong support system.

Finally, I am mostly indebted to Alexander for his endless patience and confidence in me and this project. This book is as much a product of his as it is mine and I truly see it as a dual achievement. You (and our cats) stood by my side all along and I know this is not always an easy thing to do. Although we have been together for many years, it feels like we are just getting started and I am confident that the future will bring us many more highlights.
