Preface

This book applies various angles of analysis to the study of Senecan prose style. Consequently, as I was striving to incorporate findings from scholarship on ancient literature, ancient philosophy, and modern linguistics, I requested the help of many scholars in various fields within Classics. I therefore owe numerous friends a debt of gratitude.

Gareth Williams has been a more supportive, generous, and critical reader of my work than I could ever possibly have imagined. Similarly, Mireille Armisen-Marchetti, Ermanno Malaspina, and Emanuele Berti provided me with detailed, much-needed feedback. I wish to thank them for their time, unsurpassed expertise, relentless encouragement, and patience in helping me reassess the scope of my work.

I have Kirk Freudenburg to thank for the clear-sighted supervision of my Yale doctoral dissertation and the introduction to the field of Senecan studies: he has been my most valuable interlocutor. Also dating to my years in New Haven, Christina Kraus generously contributed her expertise and helped me become a better writer. To Robert Babcock I owe thanks for his continuous, unconditional support and formidable instruction in philological rigor. Others have sustained my work through much stimulating conversation: among these are Margaret Graver and Brad Inwood, to whom I wish to express my gratitude.

My department at Union College has been instrumental in the completion of this book. I am blessed with extraordinary colleagues and with a most serene and supportive work environment. I would therefore like to express my deepest gratitude to Stacie Raucci, Hans-Friedrich Otto Mueller, who also read and commented extensively on the manuscript draft, Mark Toher, Patrick Singy, Angela Commito, Kassandra Miller, Peter Bedford, and Leo Zaibert. Equally supportive have been numerous senior and junior scholars, whom I am privileged to call friends. Among these are Amanda Wilcox, Jesse Weiner, Théophile Gellar-Goad, James Uden, Alex Dressler, James Romm, Barbara Gold, Michael Arnush, Leslie Mechem, Daniel Curley, Judy Hallett, Jacqueline Fabre-Serris, and Giulia Sissa.

The field of Senecan studies is going through a particularly prolific phase. Since so many great scholars are active in various regions of the world, their work and support have enriched me with two cardinal Stoic values: friendship and the distinct feeling of being a citizen of the world. Among these friends, I would like to thank Aldo Setaioli, Francesca Romana Berno, Jula Wildberger, Jean-Christophe Courtil, Sophia Papaioannou, Myrto Garani, and Andreas Michalopoulos. I am indebted, too, to Ernesto Stagni, who never ceases to amaze me with his knowledge, and Ornella Rossi for true camaraderie and affection. Likewise, my thanks go to Linde Brocato for always being available and offering me stimulating comments on various drafts.

Gian Biagio Conte, who has been a constant presence in my life, never stopped spurring me on to do more and better, and, with extraordinary patience and affection, accompanied me throughout this endeavor. My gratitude to him extends beyond the present achievement.

Finally, I owe much to Elaine Fantham and Remo Bodei, whose encouragements, feedback, and words of advice still resonate with me. They are, and always will be, dearly missed.

Financial support for my research, has come from the Dean of Academic Departments of Union College, Schaffer Library at Union College, and the Loeb Classical Library Foundation at Harvard University. I would like to thank wholeheartedly these institutions for their generosity.

I dedicate this book to my parents, Roberto Gazzarri and Miranda Mancini. They have unfailingly given me their support throughout many years of life in between two continents and two worlds.
