This monograph could never have materialised without the support, involvement and input of many people, though any errors in this work are my responsibility. Firstly, Adamou, thank you for pointing me at the opportunity of a PhD project supervised by Hans Peter Hahn in a joint research project about digital civic engagement in Togo. Hans, I have very much appreciated our collaboration in Frankfurt, Lomé, Kara, Sokodé and on the phone. You encouraged me to write, to continue writing and to finish without hesitation, and I am grateful for your support and patience. I also want to thank Mirjam de Bruijn for inspiring me, sharing yet another adventure, and for the opportunity to publish my book in this series. The team of De Gruyter has been amazing, with a special thanks to Verena, Sridevi and Rabea.

Without the relentless support of Kathrin Knödel in almost every conceivable way from the very first moment we met, I would have abandoned this project ages ago. Kathrin, you are the best. The Institute of Ethnography of Goethe Universität Frankfurt, especially the people who supported me with administrative challenges deserve to be mentioned; Isabel Völker, Julia Malaika, Julie Cordell and Sabine Barth. Mareike Spät, thanks for your hospitality and sharing a room during the ECAS conference. Silvia Gerlinger, thank you so much for your research assistance, your patience and your ability to adapt. Kathrin Heitz Topka, thank you for sharing your valuable theoretical ideas about trust with me. To various degrees, I shared ethnographic research ‘challenges’ with Adamou Amadou, Eef Gilbert, Eva Quansah, Inge Ligtvoet, Kassim Assouma, Karin van Bemmel, Loes Oudenhuijzen, Melina Kalfelis and Martina Cavicchioli. I thank Voice4Thought and MOWAD for the good vibes, and my teachers and colleagues at the African Studies Centre Leiden and Utrecht University, especially Geert Mommersteeg and Gerdien Steenbeek.

The collaboration with the University of Lomé was valuable, and a special thanks goes to LaDySir, Professor Hetcheli and his research team for their help at crucial junctures of my research – grand merci Edem Gnамatchи, Ifa Adanto, Koffi Adaba and Georgette Kronvi – and for offering me the opportunity to present my findings at the University of Lomé in a seminar. I also want to thank DIE for our collaboration, especially Anita Breuer, and the GFA team – Mrs. Wegener, Mrs. Brenner, Mrs. Zillich – and the German embassy represented by Mr. Tech, for all our exchanges and support at several stages of my research. I am grateful to KfW, especially Mrs. Bott and Mr. Jahn, for making this research financially possible, and for our insightful exchanges.

This long trajectory was facilitated by my precious friends who believe in me, especially our anthro++ group, Heather, Dineke, Kirsten, Elina, Miek, Betsie, Mustapha, Yookua and family Mbaye. I am deeply grateful to my father, for planting the seeds for my desire to get to know people’s dreams and search for deeper connections, and my mother, who has shown me that no combination of tasks is ever impossible – it ‘only’ requires managing inevitable practical obstacles such as running a household, as well as an awful lot of hard work, dedication and love. I thank my sisters for being the mirrors that are closest to my skin, for our continuous reflections on our paths that take us somewhere, somehow. Margo, I did it. Linde, our mind-blowing discussions have really taken this ‘thing’ somewhere.

In Senegal, after I had been given the name Mame Diarra, I was often told the story of her unconditional love and support for her husband. One night, in a thunderstorm, her husband asked Mame Diarra to go outside and hold on to a pole of their hut so he could fortify it. Accidentally he forgot her, so she stood outside until dawn, when her husband came out and saw her. The feminist in me always interpreted this story as another example of the injustice of gender inequality. Lately however, I have begun to understand that support has many faces. It takes courage to go through thunderstorms, with heavy rain pouring down, and continue to keep the faith. Roel, thank you for standing by me in all kinds of weather, and in my stormy undertaking of doing research and raising our children. Midas and Dorian, no book compares to you. Without you, this project would not have been fun; it would not even have been worth it. You bring bright light.

The relentless efforts of Kossi Essodézime Dao N’Dja, the best consultant of West Africa, have taken this book to another level. Dao, I thank God for having you in my life. Grand merci to Bataka, Dao, la Douce, le Général, Monsieur Bio, Désiré and Moussa, Freddy and Johnny, for being the persons you are. Words are a poor representation of what you mean to me. The heart is not easily understood; part of it remains unknown, even to ourselves. Amadou and Moussa, the crossing of our paths in Cameroon, Niger and Togo has changed not only your lives, but also mine. Mi yeti. I am also deeply grateful to Aicha, Afissou, Al-lahbura, Alassani, Antoine, Brice, Elom 20ce, Emile, Faras, Jef, Kader, Léa, Omar, Prince, Patrick, Pauline, Stéphanie, my late grandmother in Sokodé, and all others in Sokodé and Lomé for sharing parts of their lives with me.

Desperate and hopeless as some situations may appear, I found something in the Togolese spirit that is always fizzing and alive; some inexplicable, stubborn hope for the best, against all odds. Without this energetic love for life, my research would have been unbearable. I share the hope that tomorrow will be a better day for all the people in Togo whom I hold so dear.
